

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY EDITED BY ERNEST RHYS

HISTORY

MOMMSEN'S HISTORY OF ROME · WITH INTRODUCTION BY E. A. FREEMAN, LL.D. IN FOUR VOLS. VOL. FOUR

THIS IS NO. 545 OF EVERYDIAN'S LIBRARY. THE PUBLISHERS WILL BE PLEASED TO SEND FREELY TO ALL APPLICANTS A LIST OF THE PUBLISHED AND PROJECTED VOLUMES, ARRANGED

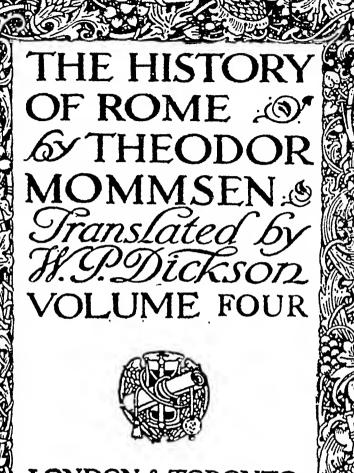

UNDER THE FOLLOWING SECTIONS: TRAVEL & SCIENCE & FICTION THEOLOGY & PHILOSOPHY HISTORY & CLASSICAL FOR YOUNG PEOPLE ESSAYS * ORATORY POETRY &'DRAMA BIOGRAPHY REFERENCE ROMANCE

FLAT DACK, COLOURED TOP: LI'ATH'R, ROUND CORNERS, GILT TOP: LIBRARY BINDING IN CLOTH, & QUARTER PICSKIN LONDON: J. M. DENT & SONS, Lad.

IN FOUR STYLES OF DINDING: CLOTH.

NEW YORK: P. P DUTTON & CO.

LONDON & TORONTO
PUBLISHED BY J-M-DENT
& SONS IP & IN NEW YORK
BY E-P-DUTTON & CO

THAT INSUE OF THIS LIBITION 1911 . REPRINTED 1921 .

CONTENTS

BOOK FIFTH

	THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE MILITARY MONARCHY
HAPT	ER	PAGE
I.	MARCUS LEPIDUS AND QUINTUS SERTORIUS	3
II.	Rule of the Sullan Restoration	35
III.	The Fall of the Oligarchy and the Rule of Pompeius	83
IV.	Pompeius and the East	106
v.	THE STRUGGLE OF PARTIES DURING THE ABSENCE OF
	Pompeius · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · · ·	146
VI.	RETIREMENT OF POMPEIUS AND COALITION OF THE PRE-
	TENDERS	176
VII.	THE SUBJUGATION OF THE WEST	196
VIII.	THE JOINT RULE OF POMPEIUS AND CAESAR	275
IX.	DEATH OF CRASSUS-RUPTURE BETWEEN THE JOINT RULERS	308
X.	Brundisium, Ilerda, Pharsalus, and Thapsus	340
XI.	THE OLD REPUBLIC AND THE NEW MONARCHY	424
XII.	Religion, Culture, Literature, and Art	528

BOOK FIFTH

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE MILITARY MONARCHY

Wie er sich sieht so um und um, Kehrt es ihm fast den Kopf herum, Wie er wollt' Worte zu allem finden? Wie or möcht' so viel Schwall verbinden? Wie er möcht' immer muthig bleiben So fort und weiter fort zu schreiben?—Goethe.

THE HISTORY OF ROME

BOOK FIFTH

CHAPTER I

MARCUS LEPIDUS AND QUINTUS SERTORIUS

When Sulla died in the year 676, the oligarchy which he had restored ruled with absolute sway over the Roman state; but, as it had been established by force, it still needed force to maintain its ground against its numerous secret and open foes. was opposed not by any single party with objects clearly expressed and under leaders distinctly acknowledged, but by a mass of multifarious elements, ranging themselves doubtless under the general name of the popular party, but in reality opposing the Sullan organisation of the commonwealth on very various grounds and with very different designs. the men of positive law, who neither mingled in nor understood politics, but who detested the arbitrary procedure of Sulla in dealing with the lives and property of the burgesses. Even during the regent's lifetime, when all other opposition was silent, the strict jurists were refractory; the Cornelian laws, for example, which deprived various Italian communities of the Roman franchise, were treated in judicial decisions as null and void; and in like manner the courts held that, where a burgess had been made a prisoner of war and sold into slavery during the revolution, his franchise was not forfeited. There was, further, the remnant of the old liberal minority in the senate, which in former times had sought a compromise with the reform party and the Italians, and was now in a similar spirit inclined to modify the rigidly oligarchic constitution of Sulla by concessions to the Populares. There were, moreover, the Populares strictly so called, the honest and credulous narrow-minded radicals, who staked property and life for the current watchwords of the party-programme, only to discover with painful surprise after the victory that they had been fighting not for a reality, but for a phrase Their special aim was to re-establish the trubunician power, which Sulla had not abolished but had disested of its most essential prerogatives, and which exercised over the multitude a charm all the more mysterious because the institu tion had no obvious practical use and was m fact an empty phantom—the mere name of tribune of the people, more than a thousand years later, revolutionsed Rome There were. above all, the numerous and important classes whom the Sullan restoration had left unsatisfied, or whose political or private interests it had directly injured. Among those who for such reasons belonged to the opposition ranked the dense and prosperous population of the region between the Po and the Alps, which naturally regarded the bestowal of Latin rights in (iii 234) as merely an instalment of the full Roman franchise. and so afforded a ready soil for agitation. To this category belonged also the freedmen, influential in numbers and wealth.

of resentment and their equal tenacity of power. The populace of the capital, which recognised true freedom in free bread-corn was likewise discontented Still deeper exasperation was felt by the class of burgesses affected by the Sullan confiscations whether they, like those of Pompen, lived on their property curtailed by the Sullin colonists, within the same ring wall with the latter, and at perpetual variance with them, or, like 'a t 'reta es e of the e

especially, were reduced to be beggars in their latmer ationes or robbers in the woods | Tinally, the agitation extended to the whole family connections and freedmen of those elemocratic chiefs who had lost their lives in consequence of the restoration, or who were wandering along the Mauretanian coasts, or somer or who were wancering along the Mauretanian coasts, or sojourn-ing at the court and in the array of Michradates, in all the misery of emigrant exile, for, according to the atrict family associations that governed the political leeling of this age, it was accounted a point of Leonor I has those who were left beland about orderayour to produce her exiled relatives the privilege of returning to their native land, and, in the case of the dead, at least a removal of the stigma attaching to their memory and to their children, and a restitution to the latter of their paternal estate. More especially the immediate children of the proscribed, whom the regent had reduced in point of law to political Pariahs (iii. 330), had virtually received from the law itself a summons to rise in rebellion against the existing order of things.

It is a nignificant lead that a distinguished trucker of transfere era freedman Stauering bene allem the efter anne ber be bereit wit in affent L separte grata, tour.

To all these sections of the opposition there was added the whole body of men of ruined fortunes. All the rabble high and low, whose means and substance had been spent in refined or in vulgar debauchery; the aristocratic lords, who had no farther mark of quality than their debts; the Sullan soldiers whom the regent's fiat could transform into landholders but not into husbandmen, and who, after squandering the first inheritance of the proscribed, were longing to succeed to a second—all these waited only the unfolding of the banner which invited them to fight against the existing order of things, whatever else might be inscribed on it. From a like necessity all the aspiring men of talent, in search of popularity, attached themselves to the opposition; not only those to whom the strictly closed circle of the Optimates denied admission or at least opportunities for rapid promotion, and who therefore attempted to force their way into the phalanx and to break through the laws of oligarchic exclusiveness and seniority by means of popular favour, but also the more dangerous men, whose ambition aimed at something higher than helping to determine the destinies of the world within the sphere of collegiate intrigues. On the advocates' platform in particular—the only field of legal opposition left open by Sulla-even in the regent's lifetime such aspirants waged lively war against the restoration with the weapons of formal jurisprudence and clever oratory: for instance, the adroit speaker Marcus Tullius Cicero (born 3rd January,  $\frac{648}{106}$ ), son of a landholder of Arpinum, speedily made himself a name by the mingled caution and daring of his opposition to the dictator. Such efforts were not of much importance, if the opponent desired nothing farther than by their means to procure for himself a curule chair, and then to sit in it contentedly for the rest of his life. No doubt, if this chair should not satisfy a popular man and Gaius Gracchus should find a successor, a struggle for life or death was inevitable; but for the present at least no name could be mentioned the bearer of which had proposed to himself any such lofty aim.

Such was the sort of opposition with which the oligarchic government instituted by Sulla had to contend, when it had, arilier than Sulla himself probably expected, been thrown by his death on its own resources. The task was in itself far from easy, and it was farther complicated by the other social and political evils of this age—especially by the extraordinary double difficulty incensive the subjection to additionally in the subjection to a subject of the subjection to a subject of the subject

fragments Only it was necessary that it should be determined to maintain its position, and should bring at least a spark of the energy which had built the fortress to its defence; for in the case of a garrison which will not defend itself, the greatest master of fortification constructs his walls and mosts in vain

The more everything ultimately depended on the personal character of the leading men on both sides, it was the more unfortunate that both, strictly speaking, wanted leaders. The politics of this period were thoroughly under the sway of it . coterie-system in its worst form. This, indeed, was nothing new; close unions of families and clubs were inserarable from an anstocratic organisation of the state, and had for centuries prevailed in Rome. But it was not till this epoch that they became all-powerful, for it was only now (first in " ) that their influence was substantiated rather than checked by legal measures of repression. All persons of quality, these of popular learnings no less than the oligarchy proper, met in Hetaeriae; the mass of the burgesses likewise, so far as they took any regular part in political events at all, formed according to their voturedutricts close unions with an almost military organisation. which found their natural captains and agents in the "distinctdistributors" (directors tribuum). With these political eleba everything was bought and sold; the vote of the elector especially, but also the votes of the senator and the judge, the fists too which produced the street riot, and the ringleaders who directed it. The associations of the upper and of the lower classes were distinguished merely in the matter of tariff. The Hetaeria decided the elections, the Hetaeria decreed the impeachments, the Hetaeria conducted the defence; it secured the distinguished advocate, and in case of need it contracted for an acquittal with one of the speculators who prosecuted on a great scale the lucrative traffic in judges' votes. The Hetaeria commanded by its compact bands the streets of the capital, and with the capital but too often the state. All these things were done in accordance with a certain rule, and, so to speak, publicly; the system of Hetaeriae was better arranged and managed than any branch of state administration; although there was, as is usual among civilised swindlers, a tacit understanding that there should be no direct mention of the nefarious proceedings, nobody made a secret of them, and advocates of repute were not ashamed to give open and intelligible hints of their relation to the Hetaeriae of their clients. If an individual was to be found here or there who kept aloof from such practices and yet mingled in public life, he was assuredly, like Marcus Cato, a political Don Quixote. Parties and party-strife were superseded by the clubs and their rivalry; government was superseded by intrigue. A more than equivocal character, Publius Cethegus, formerly one of the most zealous Marians, afterwards as a deserter received into favour by Sulla (iii. 312), acted a most influential part in the political proceedings of this period—unrivalled as a cunning tale-bearer and mediator between the sections of the senate and as having a statesman's acquaintance with the secrets of all cabals: at times the appointment to the most important posts of command was decided by a word from his mistress Praecia. Such a plight was only possible where none of the men taking part in politics rose above mediocrity: any man of more than ordinary talent would have swept away this system of factions like cobwebs; but there was in reality a sad lack of men of political or military capacity.

Of the older generation the civil wars had left not a single man of repute except the old shrewd and eloquent Lucius Philippus, consul in  $^{6.63}_{9.1}$ , who, formerly of popular leanings (iii. 130), thereafter leader of the capitalist party against the senate (iii. 211), and closely associated with the Marians (iii. 306), and lastly passing over to the victorious oligarchy in sufficient time to earn thanks and commendation (iii 312), had managed to escape between the parties Among the men of the following generation the most notable chiefs of the mire aristocracy were Chuntus Metellus Pius, consul in 42. Sulla's comrade in dangers and victories. Ouintus Lutatius Catulus, consul in the year of Sulla's death, We, the son of the victor of Vercellae, and two younger officers, the brothers Lucius and Marcus Lucullus, of whom the former had fought with distinction under Sulla in Asia, the latter in Italy, not to mention Optimates like Quintus Hortensius (\(\frac{4}{4}\)\bigce^{-\delta 4}\), who had importance only as a pleader, or men like Decimus Tunius Brutus consul in 47, Mamercus Aemilius Lepidus Livianus consul in ", and other such nullities, whose best quality was a euphonious anstocratic name But even those four men rose little above the average calibre of the Optimates of this are Catulus was like his father a man of refined culture and an honest aristocrat, but of moderate talents and no soldier. Metellus was not merely estimable in his personal character, but an able and experienced officer, and it was not so much on account of his close relations as a kinsman and colleague with the recent as because of his recognised ability that he was sent in 478, after resigning the consulship, to Spain, - --- s under Ouintus

so famili were combined very respectable military talents with thorough literary culture and a liking for authorship, and appeared honourable also as a man But, as statesmen, even these better anstocrats were not much less remiss and shortsighted than the average senators of the tume In presence of an outward for the more eminent among them, doubtless, proved themselves useful and brave, but no one of them evenced the desire or the skill to solve the problems of politics proper, and to guide the vessel of the state through the storm, seas of intrigue and faction with the han I of a true pilot. Their political wisdom was limited to a sincere belief every individual authority winds sought to t Their petts ambition was contented with little. The stores told of Metellus in Spain-that he not only allowed himself to be delighted with the far from harmonious lyre of the Spanish occasional poets, inteven wherever be went had himself received like a god with libations of w ar and odmirs of income, and a table had his head crowred by descending tectories amilie theatrical thunder with the golden laurel of the conquerorare no better attested than most historical anecdotes; but such gossip reflects the degenerate ambition of the race of Epigoni. Even the better men were content when they had gained not power and influence, but the consulship and a triumph and a place of honour in the senate; and at the very time when with right ambition they would have just begun to be truly useful to their country and their party, they retired from the political stage to spend their days in princely luxury. Men like Metellus and Lucius Lucullus were, even as generals, not more attentive to the enlargement of the Roman dominion by fresh conquests of kings and peoples than to the enlargement of the endless game, poultry, and dessert lists of Roman gastronomy by new delicacies from Africa and Asia Minor, and they wasted the best part of their lives in more or less intellectual idleness. The traditional aptitude and the individual self-denial, on which all oligarchic government is based, were lost in the decayed and artificially restored Roman aristocracy of this age; in its judgment universally the spirit of clique was accounted as patriotism, vanity as ambition, and narrow-mindedness as consistency. Had the Sullan constitution passed into the guardianship of such men as have sat in the Roman College of Cardinals or the Venetian Council of Ten, we cannot tell whether the opposition would have been able to shake it so soon; with such defenders every attack involved, at all events, a serious peril.

Of the men, who were neither unconditional adherents nor open opponents of the Sullan constitution, no one attracted more the eves of the multitude than the young Gnaeus Pompeius, who was at the time of Sulla's death twenty-eight years of age (born 29th September,  $\frac{648}{106}$ ). The fact was a misfortune for the admired as well as for the admirers; but it was natural. Sound in body and spirit, an excellent athlete, who even when a superior officer vied with his soldiers in leaping, running, and lifting, a vigorous and skilled rider and fencer, a bold leader of volunteer bands, the youth had become imperator and triumphator at an age which excluded him from every magistracy and from the senate, and had acquired the first place next to Sulla in public opinion; nay, had obtained from the indulgent regent himself-half in recognition, half in irony-the surname of the Great. Unhappily, his mental endowments by no means corresponded with these unprecedented successes. He was neither a bad nor an incapable man, but a man thoroughly ordinary, created by nature to be a good sergeant, called by circumstances to be a general and a statesman. An intelligent, brave and experienced, thoroughly excellent soldier, he was still, in the still integrity was that of a Han man. His retion his considerable property inherited and acquired, he disdained not to make money in the usual senatorial way, but he was too cold and too rich to incur special risks, or draw down on himself conspicuous disgrace, on that account. The vice so his contemporaries, rather than any

His "honest countenance" became aum. even after his death he was esteemed as a worthy and moral man; he was really a good neighbour, who did not join in the revolting schemes by which the grandees of that age extended the bounds of their domains through forced sales or measures still worse at the expense of their humbler neighbours, and in domestic life he displayed attachment to his wife and children: it redounds moreover to his credit that he was the first to depart from the barbarous custom of putting to death the captive kings and generals of the enemy after they had been exhibited in triumph. But this did not prevent him from separating from his beloved wife at the command of his ford and master Sul'a. because she belonged to an outlawed family, nor from ordering with great composure that men who had stood by him and helped him in times of difficulty should be executed before his eyes at the nod of the same master (ii. 3:4): he was not cruel, though he was reproached with being so, but-what perhaps was worse-he was cold and, in good as in evil, unimpaissmed, In the tumult of tattle be faced the enemy festlessly; in civil life he was a shy man, whose cheek flushed on the stablest

are, who make a display of the form to manage him, especially in the hands of men who knew how to manage him, especially

of his freedmen and clients, by whom he had no fear of being controlled. For nothing was he less qualified than for a statesman. Uncertain as to his aims, unskilful in the choice of his means, alike in little and great matters shortsighted and helpless, he was wont to conceal his irresolution and indecision under a solemn silence, and, when he thought to play a subtle game, simply to deceive himself with the belief that he was deceiving others. By his military position and his territorial connections he acquired almost without any action of his own a considerable party personally devoted to him, with which the greatest things might have been accomplished; but Pompeius was in every respect incapable of leading and keeping together a party, and, if it still kept together, it did so-in like manner without his action—through the sheer force of circumstances. as in other things, he reminds us of Marius; but Marius, with his nature of boorish roughness and sensual passion, was still less intolerable than this most tiresome and most starched of all artificial great men. His political position was utterly perverse. He was a Sullan officer and under obligation to serve the restored constitution, and yet again in opposition to Sulla personally as well as to the whole senatorial government. The gens of the Pompeii, which had only been named for some sixty years in the consular lists, had by no means acquired full standing in the eyes of the aristocracy; the father of this Pompeius had occupied a very invidious equivocal position towards the senate (iii. 255, 302), and he himself had once been in the ranks of the Cinnans (iii. 312)—recollections which were suppressed perhaps, but not forgotten. The prominent position which Pompeius acquired under Sulla set him at inward variance with the aristocracy, quite as much as it brought him into outward connection with it. Weak-headed as he was, Pompeius was seized with giddiness on the height of glory which he had climbed with such dangerous rapidity and ease. Just as if he wished to ridicule his dry prosaic nature by the parallel with the most poetical of all heroic figures, he began to compare himself with Alexander the Great, and to account himself a man of unique standing, whom it did not beseem to be merely one of the five hundred senators of Rome. In reality, no one was more fitted to take his place as a member of an aristocratic régime than Pompeius. His dignified outward appearance, his solemn formality, his personal bravery, his decorous private life, his want of all initiative might have gained for him, had he been bo hundred years earlier, an honourable place by the side of C

Maximus and Publius Deci of the genuine Optimate a not a little to the special between Pompeius and the mass of the burgesses and the senate Even in his own age he would have had a definite and respectable nosition, had he contented himself with being the general of the constantly aspuring to a special position in the state, and, when it offered itself, he could not make up his mind to occupy it, he was deeply indignant when persons and laws did not bend unconditionally before him, and yet he everywhere bore himself with no mere affectation of modesty as one of many pers, and termbled at the mere thought of undertaking any thing unconstitutional. Thus constantly at fundamental variance with, and yet at the same time the obedient servant of, the oligarchy, constantly termented by an ambition which was frightened at its own aims, his deeply agitated life passed joylessly away in a perpetual inward contradiction.

Marcus Crassus cannot, any more than Pompeius, be reckoned among the unconditional adherents of the oligarch). He is a personage highly characteristic of this epoch. Like Pompeius, whose senior he was by a few years, he belonged to the circle and with prudence, he entered into partnership with his freed men in the most varied undertakings, he acted as banker both in and out of Rome, in person or by his agents, he advanced money to his colleagues in the senate, and undertook—as it might happen—to execute works or to brite the tribunals on their account. He was far from nice in the matter of making profit. On occasion of the Sullan protentions a fergery in the lists lad been proved against him, for which reason bulla made no more use of him the refereward in affairs of state. He defend refuse to accept an inheritance, because the testamentary document which contained his name was notoriously forged; he made no objection, when his bailiffs by force or by fraud dislodged the petty holders from lands which adjoined his own. avoided open collisions, however, with criminal justice, and lived himself like a genuine moneyed man in homely and simple style. In this way Crassus rose in the course of a few years from a man of ordinary senatorial fortune to be the master of wealth which not long before his death, after defraying enormous extraordinary expenses, still amounted to 170,000,000 sesterces (11,700,000). He had become the richest of Romans and thereby, at the same time, a great political power. If, according to his expression, no one might call himself rich who could not maintain an army from his revenues, one who could do this was hardly any longer a mere citizen. In reality the views of Crassus aimed at a higher object than the possession of the fullest money-chest in Rome. He grudged no pains to extend his connections. He knew how to salute by name every burgess of the capital. He refused to no suppliant his assistance in court. Nature, indeed, had not done much for him as an orator: his speaking was dry, his delivery monotonous, he had difficulty of hearing; but his pertinacity, which no wearisomeness deterred and no enjoyment distracted, overcame such obstacles. He never appeared unprepared, he never extemporised, and so he became a pleader at all times in request and at all times ready: to whom it was no derogation that a cause was rarely too bad for him, and that he knew how to influence the judges not merely by his oratory, but also by his connections and, if necessary, by his gold. Half the senate was indebted to him; his habit of advancing to "friends" money without interest revocable at pleasure rendered a number of influential men dependent on him, and the more so that, like a genuine man of business, he made no distinction of parties, maintained connections on all hands, and readily lent to every one able to pay or otherwise useful. The most daring party-leaders, who made their attacks recklessly in all directions, were careful not to quarrel with Crassus; he was compared to the bull of the herd, whom it was advisable for none to provoke. That such a man, so situated, could not strive after lowly aims is clear; and, in a very different way from Pompeius, Crassus knew exactly like a banker the objects and the means of political speculation. From the origin of Rome capital was a political power there: the age was of such a sort, that everything seemed accessible to gold as to iron. If in the time of revolution a man in Rome, and no penurious miser but a speculator on the greatest scale, not speculate also on the crown? Alone, perhaps, he could not attain this object; but he had already carried out many great transactions in partnership; it was not impossible that for this also a suitable partner might present himself. It is a trait characteristic of the time, that a mediocro crottor and officer, a politician who took his activity for energy and his covetousness for ambition, one who at bottom had nothing but a colossal fortune and the mercantile talent of forming connections—that such a man, relying on the omnipotence of a stives

Above all, he threw himself into speculation

fearful havoc. Among the former, the only surviving man of fearful havoc. Among the former, the only surviving man of fearful havoc. SAN the friend and ally of Drusus ad then by Sulla's victory

ad then by Sulla's victory

3); he was a shrewd man led, either by the weight of his party or by that of his personal standing to act more than a respectable secondary part. In the democratic party, among the rising youth, Gains Julius Casar, who was twenty-four years of age (born 12 July, $$\frac{1}{2}\frac{1}{2}\rightarrow\frac{1}{2}\righ

It is used to set down the year $\frac{1}{26}$ as that of Canaria birth, because according to Successive (Gaz. 48), Flutanth (Gaz. 69), and Applian (H. 68).

ii. 149) he was at his death (55 March. $\frac{1}{2}\), in his 54th year; with which also the stars at that he was at $\frac{1}{2}\) years old at he time of the Sulian prescription $\frac{1}{2}\), "Well if at a nearly accord. But this stew is attemption without with the forts that Canaria Silicitive actively in $\frac{1}{2}\), and that these offices revold, accord "of the legen amazin, be held at the very earther in the $\frac{1}{2}\), if the forts amazin, be held at the very earther in the $\frac{1}{2}\), if the legen amazin, be held at the very earther in the $\frac{1}{2}\), if the legen amazin, be held at the very earther in the $\frac{1}{2}\), if the legen amazin, be held at the very earther than $\frac{1}{2}\), which is the very earther than $\frac{1}{2}\), which is the very earther than $\frac{1}{2}\), which is the very earther than $\frac{1}{2}\) and that are the present that the $\frac{1}{2}\) and the present that the $\frac{1}{2}\) is the second of a must be a present that the pre eyes of friend and foe. His relationship with Marius and Cinna this father's sister had been the wife of Marius, he himself had married Cinna's daughter); the courageous refusal of the youth who had scarce outgrown the age of boyhood to send a divorce to his young wife Cornelia at the bidding of the dictator, as Pompeius had in the like case done; his bold persistence in the priesthood conferred upon him by Marius, but revoked by Sulla; his wanderings during the proscription with which he was threatened, and which was with difficulty averted by the intercession of his relatives; his bravery in the conflicts before Mytilene and in Cilicia, a bravery which no one had expected from the tenderly reared and almost effeminately foppish boy; even the warnings of Sulla regarding the "boy in the petticoat" in whom more than a Marius lay concealed-all these were precisely so many recommendations in the eyes of the democratic party. But Caesar could only be the object of hopes for the future; and the men who from their age and their public position would have been called now to seize the reins of the party and the state, were all dead or in exile.

Thus the leadership of the democracy, in the absence of a

as his birthday fell undoubtedly on July 22, he was born not in  $\frac{6.5 \, \text{M}}{10.00}$ , but in  $^{652}_{102}$ ; so that in  $^{672}_{62}$  he was in his 20-21st year, and he died not in his 56th year, but at the age of 57 years 8 months. In favour of this latter view we may moreover adduce the circumstance, which has been strangely brought forward in opposition to it, that Caesar "paene puer" was appointed by Marius and Cinna as Flamen of Jupiter (Vell. ii. 43); for Marius died in January 668, when Caesar was according to the usual view 13 years 6 months old, and therefore not "almost," as Velleius says, but actually still a boy, and most probably for this very reason not at all capable of holding such a priesthood. If, again, he was born in July,  $\frac{6.5}{10.2}$ , he was at the death of Marius in his 16th year; and with this the expression in Velleins agrees, as well as the general rule that civil positions were not assumed before the expiry of the age of boyhood. Further, with this latter view alone accords the fact that the denaris struck by Caesar about the outbreak of the civil war are marked with the number LII. probably the year of his life; for when it began, Caesar's age was according to this view somewhat over 52 years. Nor is it so rash as it appears to us who are accustomed to regular and official lists of births, to charge our authorities with an error in this respect. Those four statements may very well be all traccable to a common source; nor can they at all lay claim to any very high credibility, seeing that for the earlier period before the commencement of the acta diurna the statements as to the natal years of even the best known and most prominent Romans, e.g., as to that of Pompeius, vary in the most surprising manner.

In the Life of Caesar by Napoleon III. (B. 2, ch. 1) it is objected to this view, first, that the lex annalis would point for Caesar's birth-year not to  $\frac{6.52}{162}$ , but to  $\frac{6.51}{162}$ ; secondly and especially, that other cases are known where it was not attended to. But the first assertion rests on a mistake; for, as the example of Ciccro shows, the lex annalis required only that at the enter-man with a true vocation for it, was to be had by any one who might please to give himself forth as the champion of oppressed popular freedom, and in this way it came to Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, a Sullan, who from motives more than equivocal deserted to the camp of the democracy Once a zealous Optimate, and a large purchaser at the auctions of the prescribed estates, he had, as governor of Sucily, so scandalously plundered by the province that he was threatened with imprach-

age, who did not deserve to become a leader either in council or

To age, who did not deserve to become a leader either in council or in the field. Nevertheless the opposition welcomed him, and the new leader of the democrats succeeded not only in deterring his accusers from prosecuting the attack which they had begun, but also in carrying his election to the consulship for *ff*; in see, are pertinent. When the should be completed see, are pertinent. When onierring magistrates no the and dictatorship were entrusted to quite young men he has in view, of course, as all commentators acknowledge the earlier period before the issuing of the kers annalist-oil e

which he was helped not only by the treasures exacted in Sicily, but also by the foolish endeavour of Pompeius to show Sulla and the pure Sullans on this occasion what he could do. Now that the opposition had, on the death of Sulla, found a head once more in Lepidus, and now that this their leader had become the supreme magistrate of the state, the speedy outbreak of the new revolution in the capital might with certainty be foreseen.

But even before the democrats moved in the capital, the democratic emigrants had again bestirred themselves in Spain. The soul of this movement was Quintus Sertorius. This eminent man, a native of Nursia in the Sabine land, was from the first of a tender and even soft-hearted temperament—as his almost enthusiastic love for his mother, Raia, shows-and at the same time of the most chivalrous bravery, as was proved by the honourable scars which he brought home from the Cimbrian, Spanish, and Italian wars. Although wholly untrained as a speaker, he excited the admiration of learned advocates by the natural flow and the striking precision of his address. remarkable military and statesmanly talent had found opportunity of shining by contrast, more particularly in the revolutionary war which the democrats so wretchedly and stupidly mismanaged; he was confessedly the only democratic officer who knew how to prepare and to conduct war, and the only democratic statesman who opposed the insensate and furious doings of his party with statesmanlike energy. His Spanish soldiers called him the new Hannibal, and this not merely because he had, like that hero, lost an eye in war. He in reality reminds us of the great Phoenician by his equally cunning and courageous strategy, by his rare talent of organising war by means of war, by his adroitness in attracting foreign nations to his interest and making them serviceable to his ends, by his prudence in success and misfortune, by the quickness of his ingenuity in turning to good account his victories and averting the consequences of his defeats. It may be doubted whether any Roman statesman of the earlier period, or of the present, can be compared in point of universal talent to Sertorius. After Sulla's generals had compelled him to quit Spain (iii. 324), he had led a restless life of adventure along the Spanish and African coasts, sometimes in league, sometimes at war, with the Cilician pirates who haunted these seas and with the chieftains of the wandering tribes of Libya. The victorious Roman restoration had pursued him even thither: when he besieged Tingis (Tangiers), a corps under Pacciaecus from Roman Africa had appeared to help the prince of the town, but Paccinecus was totally defeated and Tingis was taken by Sertorus On the report of such achievements by the Roman refugee spreading abroad, the Lusitanians, who, notwithstanding their pretended submission to the Roman supremacy, practically maintained their independent of Figher and Figher.

there

Sertorius, who twenty years occur a Truis Didius in Spain and knew the resources of the land, resolved to comply with the invitation, and, leaving behind a small detachment on the Mauretanian coast, embarked for Spain (about $\frac{3}{3}\text{d}$). The straits separating Spain and Africa were occupied by a Roman squadron commanded by Cotta, to steal through it was impossible, so Sertorius fought his way through and succeeded in reaching the Lustanians. There were not more than twenty Lustanian communities that placed themselves under his orders, and of "Romans" he mustered only 2600 miles and whom were deserters from the army

oman style Ser

s associating with

if troops possessing end he reinforced

the lend which he had usua, the levying 400 infantry and 700 cavity, and with this one legion and the swarms of Spanish with inteers advanced against the Romtin The command in Further Span was held by Lincus I affairs who through his absolute devotion to Sulla-30 will tred amidst the proscriptions—had risen from a sublitern to be promised; he was totally defeated on the Battis 200

Paranas covered the field of battle Messengers in all hate are non-ince of the Fbm, advance of the the experienced to the prographs.

Fulldings in sour control of the revolt. In the Fire province not only was the array of Calvinus destroyed and he himself slam by Sertonias Institution, the quaestor Lucius Hirtuleius, for Lucius Markes, the governor of Transilpine Gaul, who had crussed the Premera governor of Transslane Gaul, who had enused the l'yetere with three legions to help hir collesque, was to ally defeated h the same leave leader. With difficulty Marbus except with few men to llerda (Leri la) and thence to his province, losing o the march his whole baggage through a sudden attack of the Aquitanian tribes. In Further Spain Metellus penetrated into the Lusitanian territory; but Sertorius succeeded during the siege of Longobriga (not far from the mouth of the Tagus) in alluring a division under Aquinus into an ambush, and thus compelling Metellus himself to raise the siege and to evacuate the Lusitanian territory. Sertorius followed him, defeated on the Anas (Guadiana) the corps of Thorius, and inflieted vast damage by guerilla warfare on the army of the commander-inchief himself. Metellus, a methodical and somewhat clumsy tactician, was in despair as to this opponent, who obstinately declined a decisive battle, but cut off his supplies and communications and constantly hovered round him on all sides.

These extraordinary successes obtained by Sertorius in the two Spanish provinces were the more significant, that they were not achieved merely by arms and were not of a mere military nature. The emigrants as such were not formidable; nor were isolated successes of the Lusitanians under this or that foreign leader of much moment. But with the most decided political and patriotic tact Sertorius acted, whenever he could do so, not as condottiere of the Lusitanians in revolt against Rome, but as Roman general and governor of Spain, in which capacity he had in fact been sent thither by the former rulers. He began 1 to form the heads of the emigration into a senate, which was to increase to 300 members and to conduct affairs and to nominate magistrates in Roman form. He regarded his army as a Roman one, and filled the officers' posts, without exception, with Romans. With reference to the Spaniards he was the governor, who by virtue of his office levied troops and other support from them; but he was a governor who, instead of exercising the usual despotic sway, endeavoured to attach the provincials to Rome and to himself personally. His chivalrous character rendered it easy for him to enter into Spanish habits, and excited in the Spanish nobility the most ardent enthusiasm for the wonderful foreigner who had a spirit so kindred with their own. According to the warlike custom of personal following which subsisted in Spain as among the Celts and the Germans, thousands of the noblest Spaniards swore to stand faithfully by their Roman general unto death; and in them Sertorius found more trustworthy comrades than in his countrymen and party-associates.

At least the outline of these organisations must be assigned to the years  $\frac{674}{80}$ ,  $\frac{675}{78}$ ,  $\frac{676}{78}$ , although the execution of them doubtless belonged, in great part, only to the subsequent years.

He did not disdain to turn to account the superstition of the ruder Spanish tribes, and to have his plans of war brought to him as commands of Diana by the white fawn of the goddess Throughout he exercised a righteous and gentle rule. His troops, at least so far as his eye and his arm reached, had to maintain the strictest discipline Gentle as he generally was in punishing, he showed himself inevorable when any outrage was perpetrated by his solders on friendly soil. Nor was he inattentive to the permanent relief of the condition of the provincials, he reduced the tribute, and directed the solders to construct winter barracks for themselves, so that the oppressive burden of quartering the troops was done away and the an source of unspeakable mischief and annoyance was instruction usual in Rome, sea instruction usual in Kome, ie. Greek, and to wear the toga-a remarkable measure, which was by no means designed merely to take from the allies in as centle a form as possible the hostages that in Spain were inevitable, but was above all an emanation from, and an advance on, the creat project of Gaius Gracehus and the democratic parts for gradually Romanising the provinces It was the first attempt to accomplish their Romanisation not by extimating the old inhabitants and filling their places with Italian emigrants, but in Latinising the provincials themselves The Optimates in Rome sheeted at the wretched emigrants, the runaways from the Italian army, the relies of the robber hand of Carbo, the sorry taunt recoiled upon its authors. The masses that had been brooght into the field against Sectorius were recloned, including the Spanish general levy, at 120,000 infantry, 2000 archers and slingers and feeo cavalry Against this --- - superiority of force Sectionius had not only held his

the former-the purates - were almost as powerful to the four the Sulla had declared guilty of treason-on whom the laws of the restoration bore with intolerable severity-and generally the more noted men of Marian views were invited to accede. Not a few, such as the young Lucius Cinna, joined the movement; others, however, followed the example of Gains Caesar, who had returned home from Asia on receiving the accounts of the death of Sulla and of the plans of Lepidus, but after becoming more accurately acquainted with the character of the leader and of the mover-and anidently withdrew. Carousing and recruiting went on it canital.

was concocted among the Etmstan name ....

All this took place under the eyes of the government. The consul Catulus and the more judicious Optimates urred an immediate decisive interference and suppression of the revolt in the bud; the indolent majority, however, could not make up their minds to begin the struggle, but tried to deceive themselves as long as possible by a system of compromises and concessions. They yielded in respect to the corn law, and granted a limited renewal of the Gracchan distribution of grain, in doing which they probably returned to the mediating regulations made in the time of the Social war: according to these not all fas according to the Sempronian law) but only a definite number-it may be conjectured 40,000 of the poorer burgesses appear to have received the earlier largesses, as Gracchus had fixed them, of five modes monthly at the price of 61 asses (3d.)-a regulation which occasioned to the treasury an annual net loss of at least . 2 The apposition, naturally as little satisfied as it was which also ballust refers (Hint in fs. 19 lineted to the five mode, but only secured at - largerous of grain by regulating to purchases the chanteren and perhaps possess mades excellent.

That the Semprealin lim (1) best allowed every hopes due of the That the Semptender lim (\*) lett almeng erm stagen i mod i ne Rome to die en the langeness a codia, he all the stab has been been questly objected for letter and the stageness of the stageness of the Clerk Fern in 18, 721, objected been group becomes at the life of the grain whereas the non-letter flagment described his meters of tally far in or cost ford. It is proposed a stageness of the stag corded from the Detantantar which fatted and better fitte eserges, at decidedly emboldened by this partial concession, displayed all the more rudeness and violence in the capital; and in Etruria, the true centre of all insurrections of the Italian proletariate, civil war already broke out; the dispossessed Faesulans resumed possession of their lost estates by force of arms, and several of the veterans settled there by Sulla perished in the tumult. The senate on learning what had occurred, resolved to send the two consuls thither, in order to raise troops and suppress the insurrection.1 It was impossible to adopt a more irrational course. The senate, in presence of the insurrection; evinced its pusillanimity and its fears by the re-establishment of the corn law; in order to be relieved from a street-riot, it furnished the notorious head of the insurrection with an army; and, when the two consuls were bound by the most solemn oath which could be . contrived not to turn the arms entrusted to them against each other, it must have required the superhuman obduracy of oligarchic consciences to think of erecting such a bulwark against the impending insurrection. Of course Lepidus armed in Etruria not for the senate, but for the insurrectionsarcastically declaring that the oath which he had taken bound him only for the current year. The senate put the oracular machinery in motion to induce him to return, and committed to him the conduct of the impending consular elections; but Lepidus evaded compliance, and, while messengers passed to and fro and the official year drew to an end amidst proposals of accommodation, his force swelled to an army. When at length, in the beginning of the following year (677), the distinct injunction of the senate was issued to Lepidus to return without delay, Sempronian amount "a moderate largess, tolerable for the state and necessary for the common people" (Cic. de Off. ii. 21, 72, Brut. 62, 222; see vol. iii. 223), and must have been again adopted in the law of  $\frac{6.7}{7.8}$ . The democracy was by no means content with this (Sallust, l.c.). The amount of loss is calculated on the basis of the grain being worth at least double (iii. 102); when piracy or other causes drove up the price of grain, a far more considerable loss must have ensued.

1 From the fragments of the account of Licinianus (p. 44, Bonn) it is plain that the decree of the senate, uti Lepidus et Catulus decretis exercitibus maturrime proficiscerentur (Sallust, Hist. i. 44 Dietsch), is to be understood not of a despatch of the consuls before the expiry of their consulship to their proconsular provinces, for which there would have been no reason, but of their being sent to Etruria against the revolted Faesulans, just as in the Catilinarian war the consul Gaius Antonius was despatched to the same quarter. The statement of Philippus in Sallust (Hist. i. 48, 4) that Lepidus ob seditionem provinciam cum exercitu adeptus est, is entirely in harmony with this view; for the extraordinary consular command in Etruria was just as much a provincia as the ordinary proconsular command in Narbonese Gaul.

the proconsul haughtily refused obedience, and demanded in his turn the renewal of the former tribunician power, the reinstating of those who had been forcibly ejected from their civic rights and their property, and, besides this, his own re-election as consul for the current year or, in other words, the tyrannis in legal form

Thus war was declared The senatorial party could reckon, in addition to the Sullan veterans whose civil existence was threatened by Lepidus, upon the army assembled by the proconsul Catulus, and so, in compliance with the urgent warnings of the more sagacious, particularly of Philippus, Catulus was entrusted by the senate with the defence of the capital and the repelling of the main force of the democratic party stationed in Litura. At the same time Gnaeus Pompeius was despatched with another corps to wrest from his former protegi the villey of the Po, which was held by Lepidus heutenant, Marcus Brutus While Pompeius speedily accomplished his commission and shut up the enemy's general closely in Mutina, Lepidus appeared before the capital in order to conquer it for the revolution as Marius had formerly done by storm. The right bank of the Tiber fell wholly into his power, and he was able even to cross the river. The decisive battle was fought on the Campus Martus, close under the walls of the city. Dut Catulus conquered, and Lepidus was compelled to retreat to Etruna, while safe-conduct promised to him, subsequently put to death by

engagement on the coast of Etruna in order merely to 1 rocure the means of retreat, and then embarked at the port of Coas for Sardinas, from which point he hoped to cut off the supplies of the capital, and to obtain communication with the Spanish insurgents. But the governor of the island opposed to him a sigorous resistance, and he himself ded, not long after his landing, of consumption (YF) whereupon the war in Sardinia came to an end. A part of his sold est adaptaced, with the flower of the insurrectionary array and with a well filled clear the late practor, Marcus Perpena, proceeded to Ligura, and thence to Span to join the Sectionary.

The objectely was thus victories over Legalus Bur it for all

itself compelled by the dangerous turn of the Sertorian war to concessions, which violated the letter as well as the spirit of the Sullan constitution. It was absolutely necessary to send a strong army and an able general to Spain; and Pompeius indicated, very plainly, that he desired, or rather demanded, this commission. The pretension was bold. It was bad enough that they had allowed this secret opponent again to attain an extraordinary command in the pressure of the Lepidian revolution; but it was far more hazardous to set aside all the rules instituted by Sulla for the magisterial hierarchy, so as to invest a man who had hitherto filled no civil office with one of the most important ordinary provincial governorships, under circumstances in which the observance of the legal term of a year was not to be thought of. The oligarchy had thus, even apart from the respect due to their general Metellus, good reason to oppose with all earnestness this new attempt of the ambitious youth to perpetuate his exceptional position. But this was not easy. In the first place, they had not a single man fitted for the difficult post of general in Spain. Neither of the consuls of the year showed any desire to match himself against Sertorius; and what Lucius Philippus said in a full meeting of the senate had to be admitted as too true—that, among all the senators of note, not one was able and willing to command in a serious war. Yet they might, perhaps, have got over this, and after the manner of oligarchs, when they had no capable candidate, have filled the place with some makeshift, if Pompeius had merely desired the command and had not demanded it at the head of an army. He had already lent a deaf ear to the injunctions of Catulus that he should dismiss the army; it was at least doubtful whether those of the senate would find a better reception, and the consequences of a breach no one could calculate—the scale of aristocracy might very easily mount up, if the sword of a well-known general were thrown into the opposite scale. So the majority resolved on concession. Not from the people, which constitutionally ought to have been consulted in a case where a private man was to be invested with the supreme magisterial power, but from the senate, Pompeius received proconsular authority and the chief command in Hither Spain; and, forty days after he had received it, crossed the Alps in the summer of 677.

First of all the new general found employment in Gaul, where no formal insurrection had broken out, but serious disturbances of the peace had occurred at several places; in consequence of which Pompens deprived the cantons of the Volcae-Arecomic and the Helvin of their independence, and placed them under Massilia. He also laid out a new road over the Cottian Alps (Mont Genèvre, ii 98), and so established a shorter communication between the valley of the Po and Gaul Anudst this work the best season of the year passed away, it was not till late in autumn that Pompenis crossed the Pyrenees

Sertorius had meanwhile not been idle. He had despatched Hirtuleius into the Further province to Leep Metellus in check, and had himself endeavoured to follow up his complete victory in the Hither province, and to prepare for the reception of Pompeius The isolated Celtiberian towns there which still adhered to Rome, were attacked and reduced one after mother. at last, in the very middle of winter, the strong Contrebia (south east of Saragossa) had fallen. In vain the hard pressed towns had sent message after message to Pompeius, he would not be induced by any entreaties to depart from his wonted course of slow progression. With the exception of the maritime towns, which were defended by the Roman fleet, and the districts of the Indigetes and Laletani in the north-east corner of Spain, where Pompeius established himself after he had at length crossed the Pyrenees, and made his raw troops bis ourc through out the winter to mure them to hardships, the whole of Hither Spain had at the end of " become by treaty or force dependent on Sertonus, and the district on the upper and middle Fbro thenceforth continued the main stay of his power. I'ven the apprehension which the fresh Roman force and the celebrated name of the general excited in the army of the insurgen's, had a salutary effect on it Murcus Perpenna, who hitherto as the equal of Sertorius in rank had claimed an independent erm mand over the force which he had brought with him from Liguria, was, on the news of Pompeius' arrival in Spain compelled by his soldiers to place himself under the orders of his abler colleague

For the companion of 35 Sentatus arain employed the error of Hardens against Metellus, while I expense with a steel, army took up his position along the lower course of the Firot of the form crossing the river, if I should much the wine of the steel of the tox the the sake of procuring supplies a r . . . . . . e corps of Ca. s.

Herennius was destined to the immediate s. pport of Leiperna factors inland on the upper Ebro Sentenus in person p. coerc. rd.

if possible, alone. With joy Sertorius embraced the opportunity of fighting with Pompeius before Metellus arrived and the death of Hirtuleus transpired.

The armies met on the river Sucro (Xucar): after a sharp conflict Pompeus was beaten on the right wing, and was himself carried from the field severely wounded; Afranius conquered with the left and took the camp of the Sertorians, but during its pillage he was suddenly assauled by Sertorius and compelled also to give way on the following been annihilated overthrown the corps of Perpenna ranged against him, and taken his camp: it was not possible to resume the battle against the two armies united. The junction of the hostile forces, the certainty which thenceforth could no longer be concealed that the army of Hittuleius had perished, the sudden stagnation dispersed. But the despondency passed away as quickly as it had come; the white fawn, which represented in the ejes of the multitude the military plans of the general, was soon more popular than ever; in a short time Sectionia appeared with a military of the country to the

..... by sea, and scarcity was already making itself felt in the fromain scamp. Another battle took place in the plains of the river Turia (Guadalaviar), and the struggle was long undecided. Pompeius with the cavalry was defeated by Sertorius, and his brother-in-law and quaestor, the brave Lucius Memmius, was slain; on the other hand Metellus vanquished Perperna, and victoriously repelled the attack of the enemy's riven army directed against him, receiving himself a wound in the routhes. Once more the Sertorian army dispersed. Valentia, which Gains Herennus held for Sertorius, was taken and rared to the ground. The Romans, probably for a moment, entertained a hope that they were done with their tough antapened. The Serionan army had d'suppeared; the Remain tro ps, tenestating far into the interior, besieged the general I must in the fortress Clunia on the upper flowers. But while they wante invested this rocky strenghold, the contineers of the incire ent communities assembled elienbere; bertettes s'e'e tot if the public treasury was not only deprived of the Spanish revenues. but had annually to send to Spain for the pay and maintenance of the Spanish armies very considerable sums, which the government hardly knew how to raise. Spain was devastated and impoverished, and the Roman civilisation, which presented so fair a promise there, received a severe shock; as was naturally to be expected in the case of an insurrectionary war wared with so much bitterness, and but too often occasioning the destruction of whole communities. Even the towns which adhered to the dominant party in Rome had countless hardships to endure: those situated on the coast had to be provided with necessaries by the Roman fleet, and the situation of the faithful communities in the interior was almost desperate. Gaul suffered hardly less, partly from the requisitions for contingents of infantry and cavalry, for grain and money, partly from the oppressive burden of the winter quarters, which rose to an intolerable degree in consequence of the bad harvest of the: almost all the local treasuries were compelled to betake themselves to the Roman hankers, and to burden themselves with a crushing load of debt. Generals and soldiers carried on the war with reluctance. The generals had encountered an opponent far superior in talent, a tediously pertinacious resistance, a warfare of very serious perils and of successes difficult to be attained, and far from brilliant; it was asserted that Pompeius was scheming to get himself recalled from Spain and entrusted with a more desirable command elsewhere. The soldiers, too, found little satisfaction in a campaign in which not only was there nothing to be got save hard blows and worthless booty, but their very pay was doled out to them with extreme irregularity. Pompeius reported to the senate, in the winter of that the pay was two years in arrear, and that the array threatened to dishand if the senate did not device was and means; whereupon at length the needful sums came. The Roman government might certainly have christed a considerable portion of these exils, if they could have presuited en themselves to carry on the Spanish war with less remittrees, to say nothing of better will. In the main, however, it was rentler and in although a way after time out by the switting after year, they are the little and a second of the area of the to thoroughly favourable to insurretionary and putatical marfair. So little mold its end be foreseen, that the Sertoman me rectain seemed rather as if it world became interrespeed with other contemporary revolts and thereby add to its dangerous character. Just at that time the Romans were contending on every sea with piratical fleets, in Italy with the revolted slaves, in Macedonia with the tribes of the lower Danube, in Asia Minor once more with king Mithradates. That Sertorius had formed connections with the Italian and Macedonian enemies of Rome cannot be distinctly affirmed, although he certainly was in constant intercourse with the Marians in Italy. With the pirates, on the other hand, he had previously formed an avowed league, and with the Pontic king-with whom he had long maintained relations through the medium of the Roman emigrants staying at his court—he now concluded a formal treaty of alliance, in which Sertorius ceded to the king the client-states of Asia Minor, but not the Roman province of Asia, and promised, moreover, to send him an officer qualified to lead his troops, and a number of soldiers, while the king, in turn, bound himself to transmit to Sertorius forty ships and 3000 talents (£720,000). The wise politicians in the capital were already recalling the time when Italy found itself threatened by Philip from the east and by Hannibal from the west; they conceived that the new Hannibal, just like his predecessor, after having by himself subdued Spain, could easily arrive with the forces of Spain in Italy sooner than Pompeius, in order that, like the Phoenician formerly, he might summon the Etruscans and Samnites to arms against Rome.

Boor V

120

But this comparison was more ingenious than accurate. Sertorius was far from being strong enough to renew the gigantic enterprise of Hannibal. He was lost if he left Spain, where all his successes were bound up with the peculiarities of the country and the people; and even there he was more and more compelled to renounce the offensive. His admirable skill as a leader could not change the nature of his troops. The Spanish militia retained its character; untrustworthy as the wave or the wind; now collected in masses to the number of 150,000, now melting away again to a mere handful. The Roman emigrants, likewise, continued insubordinate, arrogant, and stubborn. Those kinds of armed force which require that a corps should keep together for a considerable time, such as cavalry especially, were of course very inadequately represented in his army. The war gradually swept off his ablest officers and the flower of his veterans; and even the most trustworthy communities, weary of being harassed by the Romans and ill-used by the Sertorian officers, began to show signs of impatience and wavering allegiance. It is remarkable that Sertorius, in this respect also like Hannibal, never deceived himself as to the hopelessness of his position, he allowed no opportunity for bringing about a compromise to pass, and was ready at any moment to lay down his command on the assurance of being allowed to live peacefully in his native land. But political orthodoxy knows nothing of compromise became less and less considerable, people began to call in question his multirry talent, he was no longer, it was alleged, what he had been, he spent the day in feasing or over his cups, and squandered money as well as time

The number of the deserters, and of communities falling away, increased Soon projects formed by the Roman emi grants against the life of the general were reported to him. they sounded credible enough, especially as various officers of the insurgent army, and Perpenna in particular, had submitted with reluctance to the supremacy of Sertonus, and the Roman governors had for long promised amnesty and a high reward to any one who should kill him Sertonus on hearing such allegations will drew the charge of guarding his person from the Roman soldiers and entrusted it to select Spariards Agunst the suspected themselves he proceeded with fearful but necessary severity and condemned various of the accused to death without resorting as in other cases, to the advice of his council, he was now more dancerous-it was thereupon affirmed in the circles of the malcontents-to his friends than to ! s ! es A second conspiracy was soon discovered, which had its seat

A second compines was soon discovered, which had its seat in his own staff, whoever was demonsted had to take fight of die, but all were not betrayed and the remaining comparation, including especially betrepring, found in the circumstances nell a new incentives to make haste. They were in the lead-quarters at Oice. There, on the invigition of Perpenna, to insure viction was reported to the general as having been actived by his troops, and at the festal has quest arranged in Expension to celebrate this viction. Section, accordingly appeared attention, as was his word, but his Spanish remain. Centrary to finder custom in the Serie man heading aftern the fault in herearch according to the series and as table, and it second as if a condition of the persons is charged that it is to be a factor of the contract of the persons in the contract of the persons in the person hear the disturbance. Then a wine-cup was dashed on the floor; Perpenna had given the concerted sign. Marcus Antonius, Sertorius' neighbour at table, dealt the first blow against him, and when Sertorius turned round and attempted to rise, the assassin flung himself upon him and held him down till the other guests at table, all of them implicated in the conspiracy, threw themselves on the struggling pair, and stabbed the definceless general while his arms were pinioned  $\binom{682}{72}$ . With him died his faithful attendants. So ended one of the greatest men, if not the very greatest man, that Rome had hitherto produced—a man who under more fortunate circumstances would perhaps have become the regenerator of his country—by the treason of the wretched band of emigrants whom he was condemned to lead against his native land. History loves not the Coriolani; nor has she made any exception even in the case of this the most magnanimous, most gifted, most deserving to be regretted of them all.

The murderers thought to succeed to the heritage of the murdered. After the death of Sertorius, Perpenna, as the highest among the Roman officers of the Spanish army, laid claim to the chief command. The army submitted, but with mistrust and reluctance. However men had murmured against Sertorius in his lifetime, death reinstated the hero in his rights, and vehement was the indignation of the soldiers when, on the publication of his testament, the name of Perpenna was read forth among the heirs. A part of the soldiers, especially the Lusitanians, dispersed; the remainder had a presentiment that with the death of Sertorius their spirit and their fortune had departed.

Accordingly, at the first encounter with Pompeius, the wretchedly led and despondent ranks of the insurgents were utterly broken, and Perpenna, among other officers, was taken prisoner. The wretch sought to purchase his life by delivering up the correspondence of Sertorius, which would have compromised numerous men of standing in Italy; but Pompeius ordered the papers to be burnt unread, and handed him, as well as the other chiefs of the insurgents, over to the executioner. The emigrants who had escaped dispersed; and most of them went into the Mauretanian deserts or joined the pirates. Soon afterwards the Plotian law, which was zealously supported by the young Caesar in particular, opened up to a portion of them the opportunity of returning home; but all those who had taken part in the murder of Sertorius, with but a single exception, died in the department Haute Garonne) as the community of the "assembled" (convenae) The Roman emblems of victors were erected at the summit of the pass of the Pyrenees, at the close of 37, Metellus and Pompeius marched with their armies through the streets of the capital, to present the thanks of the nation to Father Jovis at the Capitol for the conquest of the The good fortune of Sulla seemed still to be with his creation after he had been laid in the grave, and to protect it better than the incapable and negligent watchmen appointed to guard it. The opposition in Italy had broken down from or own ranks There their own perverseness f their emponents, were The curile chairs were vet so many victories in .

History of Rome Roor L

34 a violent death Osca, and most of the towns which had still adhered to Sertonus in Hither Spain, now voluntarily opened their gates to Pompeius. Uxama (Osma), Climia, and Colamores alone had to be reduced by force The two provinces were regulated anew, in the Further province. Metellus raised the annual tribute of the most guilty communities, in the Hither, Pompeius dispensed reward and punishment Calagurris, for example, lost its independence and was placed under Osca. A band of Sertorian soldiers, which had collected in the Pyrenees. was induced by Pompeius to surrender, and was settled by him to the north of the Pyrenees near Lucudunum (St. Bertrand.

at an of its leader, and that of the

undered once more secure

CHAPTER II

RULE OF THE SULLAN RESTORATION

WHEN the suppression of the Cinnan revolution, which threatened the existence of the senate, rendered it possible for the restored senatorial government to devote the requisite attention to the internal and external security of the empire, various matters presented themselves, the settlement of which could not be postponed without injuring the most important interests and allowing present inconveniences to grow into future dangers. Apart from the very serious complications in Spain, it was absolutely necessary effectually to check the barbarians in Thrace and the regions of the Danube, whom Sulla on his march through Macedonia had only been able slightly to chastise (iii. 292), and to regulate, by military intervention, the disorderly state of things along the northern frontier of the Greek peninsula; thoroughly to suppress the bands of pirates infesting the seas everywhere, but especially the eastern waters; and to introduce better order into the unsettled relations of Asia Minor. The peace which Sulla had concluded in 670 with Mithradates, king of Pontus (iii. 291), and of which the treaty with Murena in 67,3 (iii. 325) was essentially a repetition, bore throughout the stamp of a provisional arrangement to meet the exigencies of the moment; and the relations of the Romans with Tigranes, king of Armenia, with whom they had de facto waged war, remained wholly untouched in this peace. Tigranes had with right regarded this as a tacit permission to bring the Roman possessions in Asia under his power. If these were not to be abandoned, it was necessary to come to terms amicably or by force with the new great king of Asia.

In the preceding chapter we have described the movements in Italy and Spain connected with the proceedings of the democracy, and their subjugation by the senatorial government. In the present chapter we shall review the external government, as the authorities installed by Sulla conducted, or failed to conduct, it.

- We still recognise the vigorous hand of Sulla in the energetic measures which, in the last period of his regency, the senate adopted almost simultaneously against the Sertonans, the Dalmatians and Thracians, and the Cilician prates

The expedition to the Graeco-Illyrian peninsula was designed partly to reduce to subjection or at least to tame the barbarness tribes who ranged over the whole intener from the Black Sea to the Adriatic, and of whom the Bessi (in the great Balkan) especially were, as it was then said, notorious as robbers even among a race of robbers, partly to destroy the corsairs in their haunts, especially along the Dalmatian coast. As usual the attack took place simultaneously from Dilmatia and from Macedonia, in which province an army of five legions was assembled for the purpose. In Dalmatia the former practor Gaius Cosconius held the command, marched through the country in all directions, and took by storm the fortress of Salona after a two years' siege. In Macedonia the proconsul Appius Claudius (\*?\*=\*;\*) first attempted along the Macedono-Thracian frontier to make himself master of the mountain districts on the left hank of the Karasu On both sides the war was conducted with savage ferocity, the Thracius destroyed the places which they took and massacred their captives, and the Romans returned like for like But no results of importance were attained, the toilsome marches and the constant conflicts with the numerous and brave inhabitants of the mountairs decimated the army to no purpose, the general himself's ckered and died. His successor, Gaius Scribonius Curio (42-43). was induced by various obstacles, and particularly in a roinconsiderable military revolt, to desist from the difficult expedition against the Thracians, and to turn himself instead to the northern frontier of Macedonia, where he subdued the weaker Dardani (in Servia) and reached as far as the Danute. The brace and at le Marcus Lucullus ("1", "1") again advanced east ward, defeated the Bess in their recuntairs, took their capital Uscudama or Phil propolis (Adrian me), and a meet of them to submit to the Koman supremary Sadalas king of the Odresians, and the Greek towns on the east ceast to the c eth and south of the Balkan chan-laterers, Tomi, Callati Odensus (near Varna) Merentusa and effera-became et pendert on the Romans - Trace, of which the Romans but hitherto I chi little more than the Attal - properties on the Clersenere n'in became a perty netherp's far it meterl enter of the property of Mared "-a But it e predatory rable of the Thra are and Durfan . e o fined as they were to a small part of the empire, were far less injurious to the state and to individuals than the evil of piracy, which was continually spreading farther and acquiring more solid organisation. The commerce of the whole Mediterranean was in its power. Italy could neither export its own products nor import grain from the provinces; in the former the people were starving, in the latter the cultivation of the corn-fields ceased for want of a vent for the produce. No consignment of money, no traveller was longer safe; the public treasury suffered most serious losses; a great many Romans of rank were captured by the corsairs, and compelled to pay heavy sums for their ransom, except in special instances where it was the pleasure of the pirates to execute the sentence of death, seasoning their proceedings with a savage humour. The merchants, and even the divisions of Roman troops destined for the East, began to postpone their voyages chiefly to the unfavourable season of the year, and to be less afraid of the winter storms than of the piratical vessels, which indeed even at this season did not wholly disappear from sea. But severely as the closing of the sea was felt, it was more tolerable than the raids made on the islands and coasts of Greece and Asia Minor. Tust as afterwards in the time of the Normans, piratical squadrons ran up to the maritime towns, and either compelled them to buy themselves off with large sums, or besieged and took them by storm. When Samothrace, Clazomenae, Samos, Iassus were pillaged by the pirates  $\binom{670}{84}$  under the eyes of Sulla after peace was concluded with Mithradates, we may conceive how matters went on where neither a Roman army nor a Roman fleet was at hand. All the old rich temples along the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor were plundered one after another; from Samothrace alone a treasure of 1000 talents (£240,000) is said to have been carried Apollo, according to a Roman poet of this period, was so impoverished by the pirates that, when the swallow paid him a visit, he could no longer produce to it out of all his treasures even a drachm of gold. More than four hundred townships were enumerated as having been taken or laid under contribution by the pirates, including cities like Cnidus, Samos, Colophon; from not a few places on islands or the coast, which were previously flourishing, the whole population migrated, that they might not be carried off by the pirates. Even inland districts were no longer safe from their attacks; they oceasionally assailed places distant one or two days' march from the coast. The fearful debt, under which subsequently all the communities of the Greek East succumbed, proceeded in great part from these fatal times.

Piracy had totally changed its character. The pirates were no longer bold freebooters, who levied their tribute from the large Italo-Oriental traffic in slaves and luxuries, as it passed through the Cretan waters between Cyrene and the Peloponnesus—in the language of the pirates the "golden sea;" no longer even armed slave-catchers, who prosecuted "war, trade, and piracy" side by side; they formed now a piratical state, with a peculiar esperit de corps, with a solid and very respectable organisation, with a home of their own and the cerms of a symmachy, and doubtless also with definite political designs. The pirates called themselves Cilicians; in fact their vessels were the rendezyous of desperadors and adventurers from all countries-discharged mercenaries from the recruitinggrounds of Crete, burgesses from the destroyed townships of Italy, Spain, and Asia, soldiers and officers from the armies of Fimbria and Sertomus, in a word the runed men of all nations. the hunted refugees of all vanguished parties, every one that was wretched and danng-and where was there not misery and violence in this unhappy age? It was no longer a gung of tobbers who had flocked together, but a compact soldier-state, in which the freemasonry of exile and crime took the place of nationality, everyther and observable of the training fraction of the contract of the contr

all the bonds of social order, the legitimate commonwealth might have taken a pattern from this state—the might have saken a pattern from this state—the might have the spring of distress and violence—within which above the violable determination to stand side by aide, the serie of fellowship, respect for the prefred word and the self-choice nhiels, valour and adrottness seemed to have taken tellow. If the bunner of this state was inscribed with respect or against the scenned in the course of disaling the world between them. The consults at least left themselves on a lead with any lexitoristics; their robber pride, their robber pride, their robber pride is here. I have us a stream of the robber pride is the electric terminal and of instructs band stime, they proceeding and made it their least, to like at replace a war with all the world, what they proceed in that waither they derigate is not re-

as plunder, but as military spoil; and, while the captured corsair was sure of the cross in every Roman seaport, they too claimed the right of executing any of their captives. Their militarypolitical organisation, especially since the Mithradatic war, was compact. Their ships, for the most part myoparones, that is, small open swift-sailing barks, with a smaller proportion of biremes and triremes, now regularly sailed associated in squadrons and under admirals, whose barges were wont to glitter in gold and purple. To a comrade in peril, though he might be totally unknown, no pirate captain refused the requested aid; an agreement concluded with any one of them was absolutely recognised by the whole society, and any injury inflicted on one was avenged by all. Their true home was the sea from the pillars of Hercules to the Syrian and Egyptian waters; the refuges which they needed for themselves and their floating houses on the mainland were readily furnished to them by the Mauretanian and Dalmatian coasts, by the island of Crete, and, above all, by the southern coast of Asia Minor, which abounded in headlands and hiding places, commanded the chief thoroughfare of the maritime commerce of that age, and was virtually without a master. The league of Lycian cities there, and the Pamphylian communities, were of little importance; the Roman station, which had existed in Cilicia since  $\frac{652}{102}$ , was far from adequate to command the extensive coast; the Syrian dominion over Cilicia had always been but nominal, and had recently been superseded by the Armenian, the holder of which, as a true great king, gave himself no concern about the sea and readily abandoned it to the pillage of the Cilicians. It was nothing wonderful, therefore, that the corsairs flourished there as they had never done elsewhere. Not only did they possess everywhere along the coast signal-places and stations, but farther inland-in the most remote recesses of the impassable and mountainous interior of Lycia, Pamphylia, and Cilicia—they had built their rock-castles, in which they concealed their wives, children, and treasures during their own absence at sea, and, doubtless, in times of danger found an asylum themselves. Great numbers of such corsair-castles existed especially in the Rough Cilicia, the forests of which at the same time furnished the pirates with the most excellent timber for ship-building; and there, accordingly, their principal dockyards and arsenals were situated. It was not to be wondered at that this organised military state gained a firm body of clients among the Greek maritime cities, which were more or less left to themselves and managed their own affairs: these cities entered into traffic with the pirates as with a friendly power on the basis of definite treaties, and did not comply with the summons of the Roman povernors to furnish vessels against them. The not inconsiderable town of Side in Pamphylia, for instance, allowed the pirates to build ships on its quays, and to sell the free men whom they had cantured in its market.

Such a society of pirates was a political power: and as a political power it gave itself out and was accepted from the emigrants; we find them giving battle to the fleets of Sulfa in the eastern and in the western waters; we find individual pirate princes ruling over a series of considerable coast towns. We cannot tell how far the internal political development of this floating state had already advanced; but its arrangements undeniably contained the germ of a sea-kingdom, which was already beginning to establish itself, and out of which, under favourable circumstances, a permanent state might have been developed.

This state of matters clearly shows, as we have partly indicated already (ui. 61), how the Romans Lent-or rather dul not keep-order on "their sea." The protectorate of Rome over the provinces consisted essentially in military guardianship; the provincials paid tax or tribute to the Romans for their delence by sea and land, which was concentrated in Reman rands. But never, perhaps, did a guardian more sharrelevely lefraud his ward than the Roman oligarchy defrauded the subject communities. Instead of Rome equipping a greenil leet for the empire and centralising her marine police, the senate sermitted the unity of superintendence-without which in it is natter nothing could be dinc-to fall into alwayer, and left t to each governor and each client state to defend themselves gainst the pirates as each chose and was able. Intrad of teme providing for the feet as she had found terrell to do, xclusively with her own blood and treature and with the in of he client states, which had remained formally sover my the enate allowed the fishin war marne to dream at I learned to rake shift with the wessels which the gravial mercantile towns \* earlier - frequently with the relate themselves fortunate if their Roman governor applied the requisitions which he raised for the defence of the coast in reality solely to that object, and did not intercept them for himself; or if they were not, as very frequently happened, called on to pay ransom for some Roman of rank captured by the buccancers. Measures undertaken perhaps with judgment, such as the occupation of Cilicia in  $\frac{65}{10}$ , were sure to be spoilt in the execution. Any Roman of this period, who was not wholly carried away by the current intoxicating idea of the national greatness must have wished that the ships' beaks might be torn down from the orator's platform in the Forum, that at least he might not be constantly reminded by them of the naval victories achieved in better times.

. . cont and turden fa" ac. . a prospectate of the draw

Nevertheless Sulla, who in the war against Mithradates had the opportunity of acquiring an adequate conviction of the dangers which the neglect of the fleet involved, took various steps seriously to check the evil. It is true that the instructions which he had left to the governors whom he appointed in Asia, to equip in the maritime towns a fleet against the pirates, had borne little fruit, for Murena preferred to begin war with Mithradates, and Gnaeus Dolabella, the governor of Cilicia, proved wholly incapable. Accordingly the senate resolved in  ${}^{675}_{70}$  to send one of the consuls to Cilicia; the lot fell on the able Publius Servilius. He defeated the piratical fleet in a bloody engagement, and then applied himself to destroy those towns on the south coast of Asia Minor which served them as anchorages and trading stations. The fortresses of the powerful maritime prince Zenicetes-Olympus, Corycus, Phaselis in eastern Lycia, Attalia in Pamphylia-were reduced, and the prince himself met his death in the flames of his stronghold Olympus. A movement was next made against the Isaurians, who in the north-west corner of the Rough Cilicia, on the northern slope of Mount Taurus, inhabited a labyrinth of steep mountain ridges, jagged rocks, and deep valleys, covered with magnificent oak forests—a region which is even at the present day filled with reminiscences of the old robber times. To reduce these Isaurian fastnesses, the last and most secure retreats of the freebooters, Servilius led the first Roman army over the Taurus, and broke up the stongholds of the enemy Oroanda, and above all Isaura itself-the ideal of a robber-town, situated on the summit of a scarcely accessible mountain chain, and completely overlooking and commanding the wide plain of Iconium. The three years' campaign  $\binom{676-678}{78}$ , from which Publius Servilius acquired for himself and his descendants the sumame of Isauricus, was not without fruit, a great number of pirates and pirated ressels fell in consequence of it into the power of the Romans, Lycia, Pamphylia, West Clicia were severely devastated, the territories of the destroyed towns were confiscated, and the province of Clicia was enlarged by their addition. But, in the nature of the case, piracy was far from being suppressed by these measures, on the contrarty, it simply betook itself for the time to other regions, and particularly to Crete, the oldest harbour for the corsains of the Mediterranean (in 61). Nothing but repressive measures carried out on a large scale and with unity of purpose—nothing, in fact, but the establishment of a standing maritime police—could in such a case afford thorough relief.

The affairs of the mainland of Asia Minor were connected by various relations with this maritime war. The variance which existed between Rome and the Lings of Portus and Armenia did not abate, but increased more and more On the one hand Tigranes, king of Armenia, pursued his aggressive conquests in the most reckless manner. The Parthuns, whose state was nt this period torn by internal dissessions and enfectived. were by constant hostilities driven farther and farther back 1717 the interior of Asia Of the countries between Arrienia, Mesopotamia, and Iran, the Lingdoms of Corduene (northern Kurdistan), and Media Atronatene (Azerbijan) were converted frim Parthian into Armenian fiels, and the kingdom of Ninevelli (Mosul), or Adiabene, was likewise compelled at feast temperrands, to become a dependence of Armenia. In Mesopotamia, too narticularly in and around Nisth s, the American rule was established, but the southern half, which was in great part effect. seems not to have passed into the firm possession of the new great king, and Sciencia, on the Tigns, in particular, appears not to have been subject to him. The kingd m of I dema cr Osmene he hand d over to a tribe of warder ne Arata, which he transplanted from southern Besopotam a and settled in this region, with the view of commanding by its means the pas-sage of the Luphrates and the great route of traffel

"The familia of the high and Thomas in another than the pasts of $76 (s). In the sear Children have been about 1 with this pasts of the $76 (s). In the sear Children have about 1 with the pasts of the which we always a state to the settlement of the settlement of

But Tigranes by no means confined his conquests to the eastern bank of the Euphrates. Cappadocia especially was the object of his attacks, and, defenceless as it was, suffered destructive blows from its too potent neighbour. Tigranes wrested the most easterly province Melitene from Cappadocia, and united it with the opposite Armenian province Sophene, by which means he obtained command of the passage of the Euphrates with the great thoroughfare of traffic between Asia Minor and Armenia. After the death of Sulla the armies of Tigranes even advanced into Cappadocia proper, and carried off to Armenia the inhabitants of the capital Mazaca (afterwards Caesarea) and eleven other towns of Greek organisation.

Nor could the kingdom of the Seleucids, already in the course of dissolution, oppose greater resistance to the new great king. The south from the Egyptian frontier to Straton's Tower (Caesarea) was under the rule of the Jewish prince Alexander Jannaeus, who extended and strengthened his dominion step by step in conflict with the Syrian, Egyptian, and Arabic neighbours and with the imperial cities. The larger towns of Syria— Gaza, Straton's Tower, Ptolemais, Beroea-attempted to maintain themselves by their own resources, sometimes as free communities, sometimes under so-called tyrants; the capital, Antioch, in particular, was virtually independent. Damascus and the valleys of Lebanon had submitted to the Nabataean prince, Aretas of Petra. Lastly, in Cilicia the pirates or the Romans bore sway. And for this crown breaking into a thousand fragments the Seleucid princes continued perseveringly to quarrel with each other, as though it were their object to make royalty ridiculous and offensive to all; nay more, while this family, doomed like the house of Laius to perpetual discord, had its own subjects all in revolt, it even raised claims to the throne of Egypt vacant by the decease of king Alexander II. without heirs. Accordingly king Tigranes fell to work there without ceremony. Eastern Cilicia was easily subdued by him, and the citizens of Soli and other towns were carried off, just like the Cappadocians, to Armenia. In like manner the province of Upper Syria, with the exception of the bravely-defended town of Seleucia at the mouth of the Orontes, and the greater part the Bedouins, who were accustomed to open routes for traffic through their territory and to levy on these routes fixed transit-dues (Strabo, xvi. 748), were to serve the great king as a sort of toll-supervisors, and to levy tolls for him and themselves at the passage of the Euphrates. These Osroenian Arabs (Orei Arabes), as Pliny calls them, must also be the Arabs on Mount Amanus, whom Afranius subdued (Plut. Pomp. 39).

of Phoenicia were reduced by force; Ptolemais was occupied by the Armenians about $\frac{q}{q}^2$, and the Jewish state was already seriously threatened by them. Antioch, the old capital of the Seleucids, became one of the residences of the great king, Already from $\frac{q}{q}^2$, the year following the peace between Sulia and Mithradates, Tigranes is designated in the Syrina annals as the sovereign of the country, and Cilicia and Syria appear as an Armenian sarrapy under Magadites, the lieutenant of the great king. The age of the kings of Nineveh, of the Salmurzers and Sennacheriks, seemed to be renewed; again Oriental despotism pressed heavily on the trading population of the Syrian coast, as it did formerly on Tyre and Sidon; again great states of the interior threw themselves on the provinces along

enasts.

jews to Babylon, so we from an one... see the new kingdom—from Corduene, Adabene, Asyrin, Chicia, Cappadocia—the inhabitants, especially the Greek or half-Greek cutrens of the towns, were compelled to settle with the whole goods and chattels (under penulty of the conficcation of everything that they left behind) in the new capital, one of their eigentic cities proclaiming rail et he nothungers of the pergethan the greatness of the rulers, which sprang up in the cur nities of the Luphrates on every change in the supreme swertighty

i city like N resels

d the appendance

of palver, garden, and palk with the filter of the view in. In other respects, too, the new great king proved faith 13 to 1 is part. As amidst the propertial childhood of the East the chilling conceptions of kings with real crowns on their heast 1 are never disappeared. The garden, when he showed himself in palve, appeared in the state and the contume of a sincersize of Danik and Nexus, with the purple calian, the half while half part for turie, the long platfed triviers, the high but in, and they call didentification of the part of the continue of a sincersize of the continue of a sincersize of the part of the continue of a sincers of the continue of a sincers of the continue of the part of t

Kon Mehradiers acted with greater moderation. He

A The from was a tastof of a of the following test between this labeled has because twick fairful in the hings of the section among a first and hings of the section among his top the taston among his top the taston.

refrained from aggressions in Asia Minor, and contented himself with—what no treaty forbade—placing his dominion along the Black Sea on a firmer basis, and gradually bringing into more definite dependence the regions which separated the Bosporan kingdom, now ruled under his supremacy by his son Machares, from that of Pontus. But he too applied every effort to render his fleet and army efficient, and especially to arm and organise the latter after the Roman model; in which the Roman emigrants, who stayed in great numbers at his court, rendered him essential service.

The Romans had no desire to become further involved in Oriental affairs than they were already. This appears with striking clearness in the fact, that the opportunity, which at this time presented itself, of peacefully bringing the kingdom of Egypt under the immediate dominion of Rome was spurned by the senate. The legitimate descendants of Ptolemy Lagides had come to an end when the king installed by Sulla after the death of Ptolemy Soter II. Lathyrus-Alexander II., a son of Alexander I.—was killed, a few days after he had ascended the throne, on occasion of a tumult in the capital  $\binom{6.7.3}{81}$ . This Alexander had in his testament 1 appointed the Roman community his heir. The genuineness of this document was no doubt disputed; but the senate acknowledged it by assuming in virtue of it the sums deposited on account of the deceased king in Tyre. Nevertheless it allowed two notoriously illegitimate sons of king Lathyrus, Ptolemy XI., who was styled the new Dionysos or the

1 The disputed question, whether this alleged or real testament proceeded from Alexander I.  $(+\frac{6.66}{88})$  or Alexander II.  $(+\frac{6.73}{81})$ , is usually decided in favour of the former alternative. But the reasons are inadequate; for Cicero (de L. Agr. i. 4, 12; 15, 38; 16, 41) does not say that Egypt fell to Rome in  $\frac{666}{88}$ , but that it did so in or after this year; and while the circumstance that Alexander I. died abroad, and Alexander II. in Alexandria, has led some to infer that the treasures mentioned in the testament in question as lying in Tyre must have belonged to the former, they have overlooked that Alexander II. was killed nineteen days after his arrival in Egypt (Letronne, Inscr. de l'Egypte, ii. 20), when his treasure might still very well be in Tyre. On the other hand the circumstance that the second Alexander was the last genuine Lagid is decisive, for in the similar acquisitions of Pergamus, Cyrene, and Bithynia, it was always by the last scion of the legitimate ruling family that Rome was appointed heir. The ancient constitutional law, as it applied at least to the Roman client-states, seems to have given to the reigning prince the right of ultimate disposal of his kingdom not absolutely, but only in the absence of agnati entitled to

Whether the testament was genuine or spurious cannot be ascertained, and is of no great moment; there are no special reasons for assuming a forgery.

Flute-blower (Auletes), and Ptolemy the Cyprian, to take practical possession of Egypt and Cypris respectively. They were cal possession of Egypt and Cyprus respectively line were not indeed expressly recognised by the senate, but no distinct summons to surrender their kingdoms was addressed to them The reason why the senate allowed this state of uncertainty to continue, and did not commit itself to a definite renunciation of Egypt and Cyprus, was undoubtedly the considerable rent which these kings ruling, as it were, on sufferance, regularly paid for the continuance of the uncertainty to the heads of the Roman cotenes But the motive for waiving that attractive acquisition altogether was different Egypt, by its peculiar position and its financial organisation, placed in the hands of any governor commanding it a pecuniary and naval power and generally an independent authority, which were absolutely incompatible with the suspicious and feeble government of the oligarchy in this point of view it was judicious to forego the direct posses sion of the country of the Nile

Less justifiable was the failure of the scrite to interfere directly in the affairs of Asia Minor and Syria The Roman government did not indeed recognise the Armenian conqueror as king of Cappadocia and Syna, but it did nothing to drive him back, although the war, which under pressure of office in the state of the stat

and kingdoms on the Eug at 4.5 ... but when it allowed the Asiatics to establish themselves on the Mediterrinean which was the political basis of its empire, such a course was not a proof of love of peace, but a confession that the olerarch had been rendered by the Sulian restoration more of gratchical doubtless, but neither wiser nor more energetic, and it was for if e universal power of Rome the beginning of the end had enjoyed opportunits except the and for, knew very of gaining experience regarding from a and for, knew very well that in a record Reman was to would sen grebal a stand quite as much alone as in the fat, and that I could to him no more prudent course than to keep quiet and to strengthen his kingdom in the interior. That he was in carnest with his peaceful declarations, he had sufficiently proved in the conference with Murena (iii. 325). He continued to avoid everything which would compel the Roman government to abandon its passive attitude.

But as the first Mithradatic war had arisen without either of the parties properly desiring it, so now there grew out of the opposition of interests mutual suspicion, and out of this suspicion mutual preparations for defence; and these, by their very gravity, ultimately led to an open breach. That distrust of her own readiness to fight and preparation for fighting, which had for long governed the policy of Rome-a distrust which the want of standing armies and the far from exemplary character of the collegiate rule render sufficiently intelligible-made it, as it were, an axiom of her policy to pursue every war not merely to the vanquishing, but to the annihilation of her opponents; in this point of view the Romans were from the outset as little content with the peace of Sulla, as they had formerly been with the terms which Scipio Africanus had granted to the Carthaginians. The apprehension often expressed that a second attack by the Pontic king was imminent, was in some measure justified by the singular resemblance between the present circumstances and those which existed twelve years before. Once more a dangerous civil war coincided with serious military preparations by Mithradates; once more the Thracians overran Macedonia, and piratical fleets covered the Mediterranean; emissaries were coming and going—as formerly between Mithradates and the Italians—so now between the Roman emigrants in Spain and those at the court of Sinope. As early as the beginning of 677 it was declared in the senate that the king was only waiting for the opportunity of falling upon Roman Asia during the Italian civil war; the Roman armies in Asia and Cilicia were reinforced to meet possible emergencies.

Mithradates on his part followed with growing apprehension the development of the Roman policy. He could not but feel that a war between the Romans and Tigranes, however much the feeble senate might dread it, was in the long run almost inevitable, and that he would not be able to avoid taking part in it. His attempt to obtain from the Roman senate the documentary record of the terms of peace, which was still wanting, had fallen amidst the disturbances attending the revolution of Lepidus and remained without result; Mithradates found in concerned also

. seemed the preliminary to such a war Still more suspicious were the claims which Rome held in suspense over Egypt and Cyprus it is significant that the king of Pontus betrothed his two daughters Mithradatis and Nyssa to the two Ptolemies, to whom the senate continued to refuse recognition. The emigrants urred him to strike the position of Sertorius in Spain, as to which Mithra dates despatched envoys under convenient pretexts to the head-quarters of Pompeius to obtain information, and which was about this very time really imposing, opened up to the king the prospect of fighting not, as in the first Roman war, against both the Roman parties but in concert with the one nearest the other A more favourable moment could hardly be hoped for, and after all it was always better to declare war than to let it be declared against him In 12 Nicomedes III Philonator Ling of Bithynia, died, and as the last of his race-for the son of his marriage with Nysa was or was said to be, supposititious -bequesthed his kingdom to the Romans, who delayed not to take possession of a country bordering on the Roman province and long ago filled with Roman officials and merchants the same time Cyrene, which had been already bequesthed to the Romans in of (in 257) was at length constituted a proxince, and a Roman covernor was sent thither ( ?? ) These measures, in connection with the attacks carried out about the same time against the pirates on the south coast of Asia Miro", must have excited apprehensions in the king, the annexati n of Bithynia in particular made the Romans-for Papiligor s was hardly to be taken into account-immediate reighbours of the Pontie kingdom and this, it may be presumed turned the scale. The king took the decrave sten and declared war against the Romans in the winter of the

Gladly would Mithradates have moved undertaking a anduous a work singlehanded. His nearest and natural advantage that that shortschild run refer the proposal of his father in law. So there are not only the insurgents and the prates. Mithradates was creed to place himself in communication with level, is despatched after moving organization and to fresh Asymptotic States with Sections (p. 11) by which force of the test of the himself of the himself and the proposed of the himself of battle. More important was the support which the Spanish general gave to the king, by sending Roman officers to lead his armies and fleets. The most active of the emigrants in the east, Lucius Magius and Lucius Fannius, were appointed by Sertorius as his representatives at the court of Sinope. From the pirates also came help; they flocked largely to the kingdom of Pontus, and by their means especially the king seems to have succeeded in forming a naval force imposing by the number as well as by the quality of the ships. His main support still lay in his own forces, with which the king hoped, before the Romans should arrive in Asia, to make himself master of their possessions there; especially as the financial distress produced in the province of Asia by the Sullan war-tribute, the aversion in Bithynia towards the new Roman government, and the elements of combustion left behind by the desolating war recently brought to a close in Cilicia and Pamphylia, opened up favourable prospects to a Ponti invasion. There was no lack of stores; 2,000,000 medimni of grain lay in the royal granaries. The fleet and the men were numerous and well exercised, particularly the Bastarnian mercenaries, a select corps which was a match even for Italian legionaries. On this occasion also it was the king who took the offensive. A corps under Diophantus advanced into Cappadocia, to occupy the fortresses there and to close the way to the kingdom of Pontus against the Romans; the leader sent by Sertorius, the propraetor Marcus Marius, went in company with the Pontic officer Eumachus to Phrygia, with a view to rouse the Roman province and the Taurus mountains to revolt; the main army, above 100,000 men with 16,000 cavalry and 100 scythe-chariots, led by Taxiles and Hermocrates under the personal superintendence of the king, and the war-fleet of 400 sail commanded by Aristonicus, moved along the north coast of Asia Minor to occupy Paphlagonia and Bithynia.

On the Roman side there was selected for the conduct of the war in the first rank the consul of  $^{6,80}_{74}$ , Lucius Lucullus, who as governor of Asia and Cilicia was placed at the head of the four legions stationed in Asia Minor and of a fifth brought by him from Italy, and was directed to penetrate with this army, amounting to 30,000 infantry and 1600 cavalry, through Phrygia into the kingdom of Pontus. His colleague Marcus Cotta proceeded with the fleet and another Roman corps to the Propontis, to cover Asia and Bithynia. A general arming of the coasts and particularly of the Thracian coast more immediately threatened by the Pontic fleet, was enjoined; and the task of clearing all the seas and coasts from the pirates and their Pontic "seas" by extraordinary decree, entrusted to a single magis-corsant (at. 131) turning a sum of 72,000,000 sesterces (£720,000), in truet to build a fleet, which however, Lucullus declined. From all this we see that the Roman government recognised the root of the evil in the neglect of their manne, and showed camestiess.

in the matter at least so far as their decrees went.

Thus the war began in " at all points It was a misfortune for Mithradates that at the very moment of his declaring war the Sertorian struggle reached its crisis, by which one of his principle hopes was from the outset destroyed, and the Roman government was enabled to apply its whole power to the martime and Asiatic contest. In Asia Minor on the other hand Mithradates reaped the advantage of the offensive, and of the great distance of the Romans from the immediate seat of war. A considerable number of cities in Asia Minor opened their gates to the Sertonan propraetor who was placed at the head of the Roman province, and they massacred, as in ", the Roman families settled among them the Pisidians, Isaurians, and Clicians took up arms against Rome. The Romans for the moment had no troops at the points threatened. Individua energetic men attempted no doubt at their own hand to check this mutmy of the prosincials: thus on receiving accounts of these events the young Guus Chesar left Rhodes where he was staying on account of his studies, and with a histily collected band opposed himself to the insurgents; but not much could be effected by such volunteer corps Had not Deiotsrus, the brave tetrarch of the Tolistobogs-a Celtic tribe settled around Perimi t -embraced the side of the Romans and fought with success against the Pontic generals, Lucullus would have had to lepin with recapturing the interior of the Roman province from the enemy. But even as it was, he lost in pacifying the province and driving back the enemy precious time, for which the slight successes achieved by his cavalry were far from afford ag compensation. Still more unfavourable than in Pi tygia was the aspect of things for the Remans on the roots court of At a Minor. Here the great Ponticarray and the first hader mpl-rely mastered Bithyona, and compelled the Roman contal Cotta to take abelter with his far from numeror a force and his short within the walls and port of Chalcedon, where Mithradates kept them blockaded.

This blockade, however, was so far a favourable event for the Romans, as, if Cotta detained the Pontic army before Chalcedon and Lucullus proceeded also thither, the whole Roman forces might unite at Chalcedon and compel the decision of arms there rather than in the distant and impassable region of Pontus. Lucullus did take the route for Chalcedon; but Cotta, with the view of executing a great feat at his own hand before the arrival of his colleague, ordered his admiral Publius Rutilius Nudus to make a sally, which not only ended in a bloody defeat of the Romans, but also enabled the Pontic force to attack the harbour, to break the chain which closed it, and to burn all the Roman vessels of war which were there, nearly seventy in number. On the news of these misfortunes reaching Lucullus at the river Sangarius, he accelerated his march to the great discontent of his soldiers, in whose opinion Cotta was of no moment, and who would far rather have plundered an undefended country than have taught their comrades to conquer. His arrival made up in part for the misfortunes sustained: the king raised the siege of Chalcedon, but did not retreat to Pontus; he went southward into the old Roman province, where he spread his army along the Propontis and the Hellespont, occupied Lampsacus, and began to besiege the large and wealthy fown of Cyzicus. He thus entangled himself more and more deeply in the cul de sac which he had chosen to enter, instead of—which alone promised success for him-bringing the wide distances into play against the Romans.

In few places had the old Hellenic adroitness and ability preserved themselves so pure as in Cyzicus; its citizens, although they had suffered great loss of men and ships in the unfortunate double battle of Chalcedon, made the most resolute resistance. Cyzicus lay on an island directly opposite the mainland and connected with it by a bridge. The besiegers possessed themselves not only of the line of heights on the mainland terminating at the bridge and of the suburb situated there, but also of the celebrated Dindymene heights on the island itself; and alike on the mainland and on the island the Greek engineers put forth all their art to pave the way for an assault. But the breach which they at length made was closed again during the night by the besieged, and the exertions of the royal army remained as fruitless as did the barbarous threat of the king to put to death the captured Cyzicenes before, the walls, if the citizens still refused to surrender. The Cyzicenes continued the defence with courage and success, they fell little short of capturing the king himself in the course of the siere

Meanwhile Lucullus had possessed himself of a very strong position in rear of the Pontie army, which, although not per mitting him directly to relieve the hard pressed city, give him the means of cutting off all supplies by lund from the enemy from the enormous army of Mithradites, estimated with the camp followers at 300,000 persons, was not in n position either to fight or to march, firmly wedged in between the impregnable

for the Portic

But the had season set in, a storm cross on a great resign works, the scarcity of provisions and above all of fodder for the horses te stere works. began to become intolerable. The beasts of burden and the baggage were sent off under convoy of the greater portion of the Pontic cavalry, with orders to steal away or break through at nny cost, but at the river Rhyndacus, to the east of Cyricus, Lucullus overtook them and cut to pieces the whole body Another division of cavalry under Metrophanes and Lucus Fannius was obliged, after windering long in the west of Asia Minor, to return to the camp before Cyzicus Tamine and disease made fearful rayages in the Pontic ranks When sping came on (VI), the besieged redoubled their exertions and took the trenches constructed on Dindymon nothing remained for the king but to ruse the siege and with the aid of his fleet to save what he could. He went in person with the freet to the Hellespont, but suffered considerable loss partly at its departure, partly through storms on the voyage. The land arm) unifer Hermaeus and Marius likewise set out thither, with the vier of embarking at Lamperous under the protection of its walls They left behind their baggage as well as the sick and we need, who were all put to death by the exasperated Carrenes, I ucullus inflicted on them very considerable love in the way at the passage of the rivers Aesepus and Grameus, but they attained their object. The Pontic ships carried of the remains of the great arms and the citizens of Lampiacus themselves bevind the reach of the Romans

The consistent and discreet cond or of the war by Lee' is had not only repaired the errors of his ordinary, but had a not stronged without a pitched hardle the flower of the errors army—it was said zoo, considers. Had he still posterned

the fleet which was burnt in the harbour of Chalcedon, he would have annihilated the whole army of his opponent. As it was, the work of destruction continued incomplete; and while he was obliged to remain passive, the Pontic fleet notwithstanding the disaster of Cyzicus took its station in the Propontis, Perinthus and Byzantium were blockaded by it on the European coast and Priapus pillaged on the Asiatic, and the head-quarters of the king were established in the Bithynian port of Nicomedia. In fact a select squadron of fifty sail, which carried 10,000 select troops including Marcus Marius and the flower of the Roman emigrants, sailed forth even into the Aegean; it was destined, according to report, to effect a landing in Italy and there rekindle the civil war. But the ships, which Lucullus after the disaster off Chalcedon had demanded from the Asiatic communities, began to appear, and a squadron ran forth in pursuit of the enemy's fleet which had gone into the Aegean. Lucullus himself, experienced as an admiral (iii. 290), took the command. Thirteen quinqueremes of the enemy on their voyage to Lemnos, under Isidorus, were assailed and sunk off the Achaean harbour in the waters between the Trojan coast and the island of Tenedos. At the small island of Neae, between Lemnos and Scyros, at which little-frequented point the Pontic flotilla of thirty-two sail lay drawn up on the shore, Lucullus found it, immediately attacked the ships and the crews scattered over the island, and possessed himself of the whole squadron. Here Marcus Marius and the ablest of the Roman emigrants met their death. either in conflict or subsequently by the axe of the executioner. The whole Aegean fleet of the enemy was annihilated by Lucullus. The war in Bithynia was meanwhile continued by Cotta and by Voconius, Barba, and Gaius Valerius Triarius the legates of Lucullus with the land army reinforced by fresh arrivals from Italy, and a squadron collected in Asia. Barba captured in the interior Prusa on Olympus and Nicaea, while Triarius along the coast captured Apamea (formerly Myrlea) and Prusa on the sea (formerly Cius). They then united for a joint attack on Mithradates himself in Nicomedia; but the king without even attempting battle escaped to his ships and sailed homeward, and in this he was successful only because the Roman admiral Voconius, who was entrusted with the blockade of the port of Nicomedia, arrived too late. On the voyage the important Heraclea was indeed betrayed to the king and occupied by him; but a storm in these waters sank more than sixty of his ships and dispersed the rest; the king arrived almost alc

The offensive on the part of Mithradates ended in a complete and very far from honourable (least of all for the supreme leader) defeat of the Pontic forces by land and sea

Lucullus now in turn resorted to the aggressive. Triarius received the command of the fleet, with orders first of all to blockade the Hellespont and he in wait for the Pontie ships returning from Crete and Spain, Cotta was charged with the stege of Heraclea, the difficult task of providing supplies was entrusted to the faithful and active princes of the Galatians and to Arnobarzures king of Cappadocia, Luculius himself advanced in the autumn of $30 into the favoured land of Pontus, and the analysis of the Cappadocia, Mathradatts, (atterwards Neocaesaica, tary of the Iris, he contented himself with drawing accurates the Iris, he contented himself with drawing accurates him farther and carther mind their supplies and communications. Lucullus ripidly followed, Simope was passed by, the Halps, the old limit of Serpin, was crossed, and the considerable towns of Amisus, Lupatoria (on the Iris), and Themise; in (on the Thermodon) were invested, till at length winter put an end to the constant art and in the coldiers of Lucullus murmured at the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow the constant advance which did not allow there is the constant advance which did not allow the constant advance which did mplamts in the spring of 🛂 iie 4 t Cal ra. leasing behind two legions before Ameus under Lacius Mutena The king had made an attempt during the winter to induce the great king of Armenia to take part in the struggle, it remained like the former attempt fruitless, or led only to emp'y promies Still less did the Parthans show any desire to m'erfere in it " forlorn cause Nevertheless a considerable army, chien, fai ri by enlistments in Soythia, had again assembled under thephantus and Taxiles at Cabira The Roman army, at ich still numbered only three legions and was elecidedly interior to the Pontic in cavalty, found it ell compelled to air I as far as possible the plans and arrived, not without tell and Lin, Ly difficult by paths in the vienity of Calira. At it a from the two armers has fer a count least to period or off riving each offer. The chief struggle was fer supplies, which were on both sales scatter for this purpose Multradates ferred the fewer of the ntry under Diophantus and cavalry and a division of select infa was intended to scour the Taxiles into a flying corps, which he Halys and to seize the country between the Lycus and throm Cappadocia. But the Roman trains of provisions coming us Hadrianus, who escorted lieutenant of Lucullus, Marcus Fabitefeated the band which lay such a train, not only completely die expected to surprise him, in wait for him in the defile where imp defeated also the army but after being reinforced from the co that it totally broke up. of Diophantus and Taxiles itself, soing, when his cavalry, on It was an irreparable loss for the khrown.

The Sullan Re

which alone he relied, was thus overt first fugitives that arrived As soon as he received through the-significantly enough, the at Cabira from the field of battle-al news, earlier even than beaten generals themselves—the fate resolved on an immediate Lucullus got tidings of the victory, hetaken by the king spread farther retreat. But the resolution those immediately around with the rapidity of lightning among he confidents of the king him; and, when the soldiers saw thed with a panic. No one packing in all haste, they too were seigh and low, ran pell-mell was willing to be the hindmost; all, hven that of the king, was like startled deer; no authority, not ewas carried away amidst longer heeded; and the king himself g the confusion, made his the wild tumult. Lucullus, perceivinhemselves to be massacred attack, and the Pontic troops allowed thad the legions been able almost without offering resistance. I their eagerness for spoil, to maintain discipline and to restrain;m, and the king himself hardly a man would have escaped thath difficulty Mithradates would doubtless have been taken. Whrough the mountains to escaped along with a few attendants thource of the Iris); from Comana (not far from Tocat and the & Marcus Pompeius soon which, however, a Roman corps undetended by not more than scared him off and pursued him, till, at his kingdom at Talaura 2000 cavalry, he crossed the frontier ofhe great king he found a in Lesser Armenia. In the empire of the Tigranes, it is true, refuge, but nothing more (end of 682) fugitive father-in-law; ordered royal honours to be shown to hind detained him in the but he did not invite him to his court, and come in a sort of remote border-province to which he I decorous captivity. s and Lesser Armenia.

The Roman troops overran all Pontury submitted without and as far as Trapezus the flat coun manders of the royal resistance to the conqueror. The confore or less delay, and

treasure-stores also surrendered after m

delivered up their contents. The king ordered that the wome of the royal harem-his sisters, his numerous wives and con cubines—as it was not possible to secure their flight, should al he mut to death by one of his eunuchs at Pharnacea (Kerasunt) The towns alone offered obstinate resistance. It is true that the few in the interior-Cabira, Amasia, Eupatoria-were now in the power of the Romans, but the larger maritime towns Amisus and Sinope in Pontus, Amastris in Paphlagonia, fine and the Pontic Heraclea in Bithynia, defended themselves with desperation, partly animated by attachment to the king and to their free Hellenic constitution which he had protected, partly overawed by the bands of corsairs whom the king had called to his aid Sinone and Heraclea even sent forth vessels neurot the Romans, and the squadron of Smone seized a Roman flotill's which was bringing corn from the Tauric peninsula for the army of Lucullus Heraclea did not succumb till after a two years' siege, when the Roman fleet had cut off the cits from intercourse with the Greek towns on the Tauric peninsula and treason had broken out in the ranks of the garrison. When Amisus was reduced to extremities, the curroon set fire to the town, and under cover of the flames took to their ships In Smope, where the daring pirate captain Seleucus and the royal eunuch Bacchides conducted the defence, the garnson plundered the houses before it withdrew, and set the ships which it could not take along with it on fire, it is said that, although the greater portion of the defenders were enabled to embark, 8000 corrains were there put in death by Lucullus. These sieges of town lasted for two whole years and more after the battle of Cal re (672-674), I ucullus prosecuted there in great part by metris of his heutenants while he himself regulated the affairs of the province of Asia, which demanded and obtained a threough reform

Remarkable, in an historical point of view, as was that obstinate resistance of the Povice mercantile tow is to the victorious Romans, it was of little mercantile tow is to the victorious Romans, it was of little mercantile tow, it is called the standards, for the prient at feast, no sevents nate off ferrome limit to his largel in. The Roman emigration Asia 1-11 is their best men by the destruction of the Aspar Port, of the services not a few, such as the active lastest in its May and thous I amount, had made their poer with Line 15, and with the death of Ser his, who per before the act of the battle of Calling, the last 1 per of the emission of the services and the called Calling, the last 1 per of the emission of the services of the laster of the laster of the services of the services of the laster of the laster of the services of the laster of the laster radates' own power was totally shattered, and one after another his remaining supports gave way; his squadrons returning from Crete and Spain, to the number of seventy sail, were attacked and destroyed by Triarius at the island of Tenedos; even the governor of the Bosporan kingdom, the king's own son Machares, deserted him, and as independent prince of the Tauric Chersonese concluded on his own behalf peace and friendship with the Romans  $\binom{684}{70}$ . The king himself, after a not too glorious resistance, was confined in a remote Armenian mountainstronghold, a fugitive from his kingdom and almost a prisoner of his son-in-law. Although the bands of corsairs might still hold out in Crete, and such as had escaped from Amisus and Sinope might make their way along the hardly-accessible east coast of the Black Sea to the Sanegae and Lazi, the skilful conduct of the war by Lucullus and his judicious moderation. which did not disdain to remedy the just grievances of the provincials and to employ the repentant emigrants as officers in his army, had at a moderate sacrifice delivered Asia Minor from the enemy and annihilated the Pontic kingdom, so that it might be converted from a Roman client-state into a Roman province. A commission of the senate was expected, to settle in concert with the commander-in-chief the new provincial organisation.

But the relations with Armenia were not yet settled. That a declaration of war by the Romans against Tigranes was in itself justified and even demanded, we have already shown. Lucullus, who looked at the state of affairs from a nearer point of view and with a higher spirit than the senatorial college in Rome, perceived clearly the necessity of confining Armenia within its bounds and of re-establishing the lost dominion of Rome over the Mediterranean. He showed himself in the conduct of Asiatic affairs no unworthy successor of his instructor and friend Sulla. A Philhellene above most Romans of his time. he was not insensible to the obligation which Rome had come under when taking up the heritage of Alexander—the obligation to be the shield and sword of the Greeks in the East. Personal motives—the wish to earn laurels also beyond the Euphrates, irritation at the fact that the great king in a letter to him had omitted the title of Imperator—may doubtless have partly influenced Lucullus; but it is unjust to assume paltry and selfish motives for actions, which motives of duty quite suffice to explain. The Roman governing college at any rate—timid, indolent, ill-informed, and above all beset by perpetual financial by the favourable turn of the last syria, and at the same time a recognition of their hereditary claims on Egypt. If the latter a recognition of their hereditary claims on Egypt. If the latter a recognition of their hereditary claims on Egypt.

intervention. It the lavourable the many states of the law to be dealt with in earnest, Lucullus had to undertake the war, without any proper orders from the senate, at his own hand and his own risk; he found himself, just like Sulla, compelled to execute what he did in the most manifest interest of the existing government, not with its sanction, but in spite of it. His resolution was facilitated by the uncertainty of the relations, wavening between peace and war, which had long subsisted between Rome and Amenia—an uncertainty which screened in some measure the arbitrarness of his proceedings, and readily suggested formal grounds for war. The state of matters in Cappadocia and Syria afforded pretexts reathing. As, however, ice to the conduct of the sed to connect what he

Appius Claudius, 10 ...

suffender of Mithradates, which in fact could not been. The resolution was a grave one, especially considering the condition of the Roman army. It was indepentable during the carryogin in Armenta to keep the extensive territory of Fortus strongly, occupied—otherwise the army in Armenta in hit has its communications with home, and besides it might be easily forever that Mithradates would attempt an irroad or to the former kingdom. The army, at the heal of which land is had colled the Mithradatic war, are using to about a proportion, was obviously madequate for this district talk. Under column circumstances the general would have asked and obtained from his government the departit of a record arms, but as faculties withed, and was in some recasure compelled.

59 to take up the war over the head of the government, he found himself necessitated to renounce that plan and—although he himself incorporated the captured Thracian mercenaries of the Pontic king with his troops—to carry the war over the Euphrates with not more than two legions, or at most 15,000 men. This was itself hazardous; but the smallness of the number might be in some degree compensated by the tried valour of the army consisting throughout of veterans. A much worse circumstance was the temper of the soldiers, to which Lucullus, in his high aristocratic fashion, had given far too little heed. Lucullus was an able general, and-according to the aristocratic standardan upright and benevolent man, but very far from being a favourite with his soldiers. He was unpopular, as a decided adherent of the oligarchy; unpopular, because he had vigorously checked the monstrous usury of the Roman capitalists in Asia Minor; unpopular, on account of the toils and fatigues which he inflicted on his troops; unpopular, because he demanded strict discipline in his soldiers and prevented as far as possible the pillage of the Greek towns by his men, but withal caused many a waggon and many a camel to be laden with the treasures of the East for himself; unpopular too on account of his manner, which was polished, stately, Hellenising, not at all familiar, and inclining, wherever it was possible, to ease and pleasure. There was no trace in him of the charm which creates a personal bond between the general and the soldier. Moreover, a large portion of his ablest soldiers had reason to complain of the unmeasured prolongation of their term of service. His two best legions were the same which Flaccus and Fimbria had led in  $\frac{6.68}{86}$  to the East (iii. 289); notwithstanding that shortly after the battle of Cabira they had been promised their discharge well earned by thirteen campaigns, Lucullus now led them beyond the Euphrates to face a new incalculable war—it seemed as though the victors of Cabira were to be treated worse than the vanquished of Cannae (ii. 128, 169). It was in fact more than rash that, with troops so weak and so much out of humour, a general should at his own hand and, strictly speaking, in the face of the constitution, undertake an expedition to a distant and unknown land, full of rapid streams and snow-clad mountains—a land which from the very vastness of its extent rendered any lightly-undertaken attack fraught with danger. The conduct of Lucullus was therefore much and not unreasonably censured in Rome; but amidst the censure the fact should not have been concealed, that the perversity of the government was the prime occasion of this venturesome project of the general, and, if it did not justify it, rendered it at least excusable

The mission of Apprus Claudius was intended not only to furnish a diplomatic pretext for the war, but also to induce the princes and cities of Syria especially to take arms against the winter the transport; was directed through the province of Sophene, without losing time with the siege of smaller places, straight towards Tigranocerta, whither the great king had shortly before returned from Syria, after having temporarily deferred the prosecution of his plans of conquest on the Mediterianean on account of the embroilment with the Romans. He was just projecting an inroad into Roman Asia from Cilicia and Lycaonia, and was considering whether

would previously give

messenger interrupte Lucullus. He ordered the messenger to be hanged, but the disagreeable reality remained unaltered; so he left his capital and resorted to the interior of Armenia, to raise a force—which had not yet been done—against the Romans. Meanwhile Mithrobarranes with the troops actually at his disposal and in content with the neighbouring Bedouin tribes, who were called out in all haste, was to give employment to the enemy. But the corps of Mithrobarranes was dispersed by the Roman anguard, and the Arabs by a detachment under Sexthius; and, while the

was held in check by a sushed forward—in a welle ressful, Lucullus

upon the Roman army, and the setting free to the bee crug machines by means of naphtha, initiated the Romans ent of new dangers of Jranuan warfare, and the frace commandant Mancaeus maintained the city, till at length the great royal army of relief had assembled from all parts of the sait criper and the adjoining countries that were open to Armenian recruiting officers, and had advanced through the north-artern paires to the residue of the capital. The leader Taxler, caper revolution to wars of Mithardiates, advised Thyraces to act in a lastic, and to surround and giarree out the small Roman army by reserved.

his cavalry. But when the king saw the Roman general, who had determined to give battle without raising the siege, move out with not much more than 10,000 men against a force twenty times superior, and boldly cross the river which separated the two armies; when he surveyed on the one side this little band, "too many for an embassy, too few for an army," and on the other side his own immense host, in which the peoples of the Black Sea and the Caspian met with those of the Mediterranean and of the Persian Gulf, in which the dreaded iron-clad lancers alone were more numerous than the whole army of Lucullus, and in which even infantry armed after the Roman fashion were not wanting; he resolved promptly to accept the battle desired by the enemy. But while the Armenians were still forming their array, the quick eye of Lucullus perceived that they had neglected to occupy a height which commanded the whole position of their cavalry. He hastened to occupy it with two cohorts, while at the same time his weak cavalry by a flank attack diverted the attention of the enemy from this movement; and as soon as he had reached the height, he led his little band against the rear of the enemy's cavalry. They were totally broken and threw themselves on the not yet fully formed infantry, which fled without striking a blow. The bulletin of the victor -that 100,000 Armenians and five Romans had fallen and that the king, throwing away his turban and diadem, had galloped off unrecognised with a few horsemen-is composed in the style of his master Sulla. Nevertheless the victory achieved on the 6th October 685 before Tigranocerta remains one of the most brilliant in the glorious history of Roman warfare; and it was not less momentous than brilliant.

All the provinces wrested from the Parthians or Syrians were now strategically lost to the Armenians, and passed, for the most part, without delay into the possession of the victor. The newly-built capital of the great kingdom itself set the example. The Greeks, who had been forced in such numbers to settle there, rose against the garrison and opened to the Roman army the gates of the city, which was abandoned to the pillage of the soldiers. From Cilicia and Syria all the troops had already been withdrawn by the Armenian satrap Magadates to reinforce the relieving army before Tigranocerta. Lucullus advanced into Commagene, the most northern province of Syria, and stormed Samosata, the capital; he did not reach Syria proper, but envoys arrived from the dynasts and communities as far as the Red Sea—from Hellenes, Syrians, Jews, Arabs—to do homage to the Romans as their new sovereigns. Even the prince of Corduene, the province situated to the east of Tigranocetta, submitted, while, on the other hand, Guras the brother of the great king maintained himself in Nisihis, and thereby in Mesonatama. Lucullus everywhere came forward as the protector.

the throne,

the Amenians had returned to the sent away the forced settlers of Tigranocerta once more to their homes. The immense stores and treasures of the great king—the grain amounted to 30,000,000 medium, the more in Tigranocerta alone to 8000 talents (nearl) 62,000 000)—enabled Lucullus to defray the expenses of the war without maleng any demand on the state treasury, and to bestow on each of his soldiers, besides the amplest maintenance, a present of 800 demant (133). The great king was deeply humbled. He was of a feeble character, arrogant in prosperity, faint hearted in adversity. Probably an agreement would have been come to be ween him and Lucullus-an agreement which there was every reason that the great king should purchase by considerable sacrifices, and the Roman general should grant under tolerable conditionslind not the old Mithradates interfered. The latter had taken no part in the conflicts around Tigrinocerta. Inherated after twenty months' captivity about the middle of "to" in consequence of the variance that had occurred between the great king and the Romans, he had been despatched with 10,000 American cavilry to his former kingdom, to threaten the communications of the enems. Recalled even before he aul I accomplish anything there when the great king a .- mored tis whole force to relieve the capital which he had built, Michea faces was met on his armal before Digranocerta by the rivilate to just feeing from the feld of battle. To every one from the pread king down to the common soldier, all seemed lost. But if Tigranes should now make peace, no only would Materialities lose the last chance of being reastered in t s k and m has t a surrender would be bevord doubt the first cond torn of prace, and certainly Tigranes would not have acted otherwine t wards tim than Borehus had formerly acted towards Jugure's "He king accordingly staked his whole personal weight to present things from taking this course, and to induce the Atreen in court to commune the war, in which he had in their to be and everything to gain; and, fugitive and dethroned as was Mithradates, his influence on the court was not inconsiderable. He was still a stately and powerful man, who, although upwards of sixty years old, vaulted on horseback in full armour, and in hand-to-hand conflict stood his ground like the best. Years and vicissitudes seemed to have steeled his spirit: while in earlier times he sent forth generals to lead his armies and took no direct part in war himself, we find him henceforth as an old man commanding in person and fighting in person on the field of battle. To one who, during his fifty years of rule, had witnessed so many unexampled vicissitudes, the cause of the great king appeared by no means lost through the defeat of Tigranocerta; whereas the position of Lucullus was very difficult, and, if peace should not now take place and the war should be judiciously continued, even in a high degree precarious.

The veteran of varied experience, who stood towards the great king almost as a father, and was now able to exercise a personal influence over him, overpowered by his energy that weak man, and induced him not only to resolve on the continuance of the war, but also to entrust Mithradates with its political and military management. The war was now to be changed from a cabinet contest into a national Asiatic struggle; the kings and peoples of Asia were to unite for this purpose against the domineering and haughty Occidentals. The greatest exertions were made to reconcile the Parthians and Armenians, and to induce them to make common cause against Rome. At the suggestion of Mithradates, Tigranes offered to give back to the Arsacid Phraates the God (who had reigned since  $\frac{6.84}{70}$ ) the provinces conquered by the Armenians—Mesopotamia, Adiabene, the "great valleys"—and to enter into friendship and alliance with him. But, after all that had previously taken place, this offer could scarcely reckon on a favourable reception; Phraates preferred to secure the boundary of the Euphrates by a treaty not with the Armenians, but with the Romans, and to look on, while the hated neighbour and the inconvenient foreigner fought out their strife. Greater success attended the application of Mithradates to the peoples of the East than to the kings. It was not difficult to represent the war as a national one of the East against the West, for such it was; it might very well be made a religious war also, and the report might be spread that the object aimed at by the army of Lucullus was the temple of the Persian Nanaea or Anaitis in Elymais or the modern Luristan, the most celebrated and the richest shrine is the whole region of the Euphrates. From far and near the Asiancs flocked in crowds to the banner of the kings, who summoned capable of marching and fighting were by their very incorpora-

among the Asiatics, the cavalry; in the army newly formed by him half of the force was mounted. For the ranks of the maintry he carefully selected, out of the mass of recruits called forth a many how the first of the army, how the army, how the army, how the army how the army how.

ever, the great king was destined not to measure its strength with the Roman veterans on the first chance field of battle, but to confine itself to defence and petty warfare. Mithradates had conducted the last war in his empire on the system of constantly retrievating and avoiding battle; similar tactics were adopted on this occasion, and Ammelia proper was destined as the theatre of wat—the hereditary land of Tigranes, still wholly untorothed by the enemy, and excellently adapted for this sort of warfare both by its physical character and to the patrontoner of its highstants.

The year *** found Luculius in a position of difficulty, which duly assumed a more diagerous aspect. In space of his brill art victories, people in Rome were not at all satisfied with him. The senate felt the arbitrary nature of his conduct; the capital party, sorely offended by him, set all recurs of intrince and corruption at work to effect his recall. Duly the horam enhancement with just and unjust complaints regarding the for "as "is, the controls, the un-Roman, the triationist greated. The senate is far yielded to the complaints regarding the union of s. then Intel power—two ordinars, posternoling and a mightigate extraord nary command—in the bands of such a run as to assume the processor of Giret all as with time nowless of large mass the control Quentus Martin is Rex, and to restort the general to the command against Mithalates and Thermon.

"General De Imp. P. mo. 9, 23) has By mean my other their reserved the tender of the granter of young with the product of the granter of young with the product of the granter of the gran

These accusations springing up against the general in Rome found a dangerous echo in the soldiers' quarters on the Iris and on the Tigris; and the more so that several officers including the general's own brother-in-law, Publius Clodius, worked upon the soldiers with this view. The report beyond doubt designedly circulated by these, that Lucullus now thought of combining with the Pontic-Armenian war an expedition against the Parthians, augmented the exasperation of the troops.

But while the troublesome temper of the government and of the soldiers thus threatened the victorious general with recall and mutiny, he himself continued like a desperate gambler to increase his stake and his risk. He did not march against the Parthians; but when Tigranes showed himself neither ready to make peace nor disposed, according to the wish of Lucullus, to risk a second pitched battle, Lucullus resolved to advance from Tigranocerta, through the difficult mountain-country along the eastern shore of the lake of Van, into the valley of the eastern Euphrates (or the Arsanias, now Myrad-Chai), and thence into that of the Araxes, where, on the northern slope of Ararat, lay Artaxata the capital of Armenia proper, with the hereditary castle and the harem of the king. He hoped, by threatening the king's hereditary residence, to compel him to fight either on the way or at any rate before Artaxata. It was inevitably necessary to leave behind a division at Tigranocerta; and, as the marching army could not possibly be further reduced. no course was left but to weaken the position in Pontus and to summon troops thence to Tigranocerta. The main difficulty, however, was the shortness of the Armenian summer, so inconvenient for military enterprises. On the table-land of Armenia, which lies 5000 feet and more above the level of the sea, the corn at Erzeroum only germinates in the beginning of June, and the winter sets in with the harvest in September; Artaxata had to be reached and the campaign had to be ended in four months at the utmost.

At midsummer, <sup>6,6,6</sup>/<sub>6,8</sub>, Lucullus set out from Tigranocerta, and—passing doubtless through the valley of the Karasu, a stream flowing in a south-easterly direction to join the eastern arm of the Euphrates, the only valley which connects the plains of Mesopotamia with the table-land of interior Armenia—arrived on the plateau of Musch and at the Euphrates. The march went on—amidst constant and very troublesome skirmishing with the enemy's cavalry, and especially with the mounted archers—slowly, but without material hindrance; and the passage of the Euphrates, which was seriously defended by the Armenian cavalry, was secured by a successful engagement: the Armenian infantry showed itself, but the attempt to manive it in the conflict did not succeed. Thus the army reached the table-land, properly so called, of Armenia, and continued its march into the unknown country. They had suffered no actual misfortune: but the mere mentable retardation of the march by the difficulties of the ground and the horsemen of the enemy was itself a very serious disadvantage. Long before they had reached Artaxata, winter set in; and when the Italian soldiers saw snow and ice around them, the bow of military discipline that had been far too tightly stretched case was

A formal mutiny compelled the general to order a retreat which he effected with his usual skill. When he had safely reached the plain where the season still permitted farther operations. Luculius crossed the Tartis, and threw himself with the mass of his army on Nisibis, the capital of Armenian Mesonotamia. The great king, rendered wiser by the experience acousted before Tigranocerta, left the city to itself: rotwishstanding its brave defence it was stormed in a dark, rainy night by the besievers, and the army of Luculius found there booty not fess ample and winter-quarters no fess comfurtable than the year before in Tigranocerta,

But, meanwhile, the whole weight of the enemy's offertive fell on the weak Roman divisions left behind in Pontus and -- -- movelled the Roman commander kept hen beleaguered there. Same with 4000 Armenian horsemen and 4000 of its own, a is at liberator and avenger summoned the nation to rive against the common foe. All joined him, the scattered Reman & lders were everywhere seized and put to death; when Ha liunus, the Roman commandant in Pentus (p. 35), led his trops arainst him, the former merceraties of the king and the nur read natives of Pontus following the array as slaves male tie met cause with the enemy. For two successive days the unit, all conflict lasted; it was only the encurritance that the kine after receiving two wounds had to be carried off from the feld of buttle, which gave the Reman elemander the enqueries of breaking off the simulty byt lastic, and the weig bestelf with the will recorder of he loops into Cat ra. An ever of Lucullus' lieutenants who accidentally came into this region, the resolute Triarius, again gathered round him a body of troops and fought a successful engagement with the king; but he was much too weak to expel him afresh from Pontic soil, and had to acquiesce while the king took up winter-quarters in Comana.

So the spring of  $\frac{687}{67}$  came on. The reunion of the army in Nisibis, the idleness of winter-quarters, the frequent absence of the general, had meanwhile increased the insubordination of the troops; not only did they vehemently demand to be led back, but it was already tolerably evident that, if the general refused to lead them home, they would break up of themselves. supplies were scanty; Fannius and Triarius, in their distress, sent the most urgent entreaties to the general to furnish aid. With a heavy heart Lucullus resolved to yield to necessity, to give up Nisibis and Tigranocerta, and, renouncing all the brilliant hopes of his Armenian expedition, to return to the right bank of the Euphrates. Fannius was relieved; but in Pontus the help was too late. Triarius, not strong enough to fight with Mithradates, had taken up a strong position at Gaziura (Turksal on the Iris, to the west of Tokat), while the baggage was left behind at Dadasa. But when Mithradates laid siege to the latter place, the Roman soldiers, apprehensive for their property, compelled their leader to leave his secure position, and to give battle to the king between Gaziura and Ziela (Zilleh) on the Scotian heights.

What Triarius had foreseen occurred. In spite of the stoutest resistance the wing which the king commanded in person broke the Roman line and huddled the infantry together into a clayey ravine, where it could make neither a forward nor a lateral movement and was cut to pieces without pity. The king indeed was dangerously wounded by a Roman centurion, who sacrificed his life for it; but the defeat was not the less complete. The Roman camp was taken; the flower of the infantry, and almost all the staff and subaltern officers, strewed the ground; the dead were left lying unburied on the field of battle, and, when Lucullus arrived on the right bank of the Euphrates, he learned the defeat not from his own soldiers, but through the reports of the natives.

Along with this defeat came the outbreak of the military conspiracy. At this very time news arrived from Rome that the people had resolved to grant a discharge to the soldiers whose legal term of service had expired, to wit, to the Fimbrians, and to entrust the chief command in Pontus and Bithynia to one of the consuls of the current year: the successor of Lucullus, the consul Manius Acilius Glabrio, had already landed in Asia Mmor. The disbanding of the bravest and most turbulent legions and the recall of the commander-in-chief, in connection with the impression produced by the defeat of Ziela, disolved all the bonds of authority in the army just when the general had most urgent need of their aid. Near Talaura in Lever "mite troops, at whose head Tig-

of Media, had already engaged cavalry conflict, the main force of the great king was advancing to the same point from Armenia. Lucullus sent to Quintus Mareius the new governor of Cilicia, who had just arrived on the way to his province with three legions in Lycaoma, to ask him for aid; Mareius declared that his soldiers refused to march to Armenia. He sent to Glabrio with the request that he would take up the supreme command committed to him by the people; Glabrio showed still less inclination to undertake this task, which had now become so difficult and hazardous. Lucullus, compelled to retain the command, with the view of not being obliged to fight a Talaura against the Armenian and the Pontie armies conjoined, ordered a movement against the advancing Armenians.

The soldiers obeyed the order to march: but, when they reached the point where the routes to Armenia and Cappadocia diverged, the bulk of the army took the latter, and processed to the province of Asia. There the Limbnans demanded their immediate discharge, and although they desixted from this at the urgent entreaty of the commander-in-chief and the other corps, they set persesered in their purpose of dislorabe; If the winter should come or without an enemy confronting them, which accordingly was the case. Mithradates not only exer pred once more almost his whole kingdom, but his cavalry target over all Cappadocia and as far as Bithyma: Ling Air largance sought help equally in sain from Quantus Marena, from Livil int. and from Glabrio It was a strange almost merchibie in +1 ca war conducted in a manner so glorien. If we bed repriv to military acties ements, bandly any other Reman peneral accomplished so much with so the ne treats at fart" as, the talent and the firtune of Sulla seemed to lave der lied on that In disciple. That worder the encumplances the Rice in arrest should have returned from Armer's to Aus More un parell, is a military mittele wied, so far as we con f fer, ter earels the retreat of New phone and, although manifest a "culty be explained by the whality of the Pirman, and the torticemy of the Oriental, system of war, it at all events secures to the leader of this expedition an honourable name in the foremost rank of men of military capacity. If the name of Lucullus is not usually included among these, it is to all appearance simply owing to the fact that no narrative of his campaigns which is in a military point of view even tolerable has come down to us, and to the circumstance that in everything, and particularly in war, nothing is taken into account but the final result; and this, in reality, was equivalent to a complete defeat. Through the last unfortunate turn of things, and principally through the mutiny of the soldiers, all the results of an eight years' war had been lost; in the winter of  $\frac{6.9.7}{6.3.7} - \frac{6.9.5}{6.0.5}$  the Romans again stood exactly at the same spot as in the winter of  $\frac{6.7.0}{6.3.7} - \frac{6.9.5}{6.0.5}$ .

The maritime war against the pirates, which began at the same time with the continental war and was all along most closely connected with it, yielded no better results. It has been already mentioned (p. 50) that the senate in  $\frac{n \cdot n}{74}$  adopted the judicious resolution to entrust the task of clearing the seas from the corsairs to a single admiral in supreme command, the practor Marcus Antonius. But at the very outset they had made an utter mistake in the choice of the leader; or rather those who had carried this measure, so appropriate in itself, had not taken into account that in the senate all personal questions were decided by the influence of Cethegus (p. 7) and similar coterieconsiderations. They had moreover neglected to furnish the admiral of their choice with money and ships in a manner befitting his comprehensive task, so that with his enormous requisitions he was almost as burdensome to the provincials whom he befriended as were the corsairs. The results were corresponding. In the Campanian waters the fleet of Antonius captured a number of piratical vessels. But an engagement took place with the Cretans, who had entered into friendship and alliance with the pirates and abruptly rejected his demand that they should desist from such fellowship; and the chains, with which the foresight of Antonius had provided his vessels for the purpose of placing the captive buccaneers in irons, served to fasten the quaestor and the other Roman prisoners to the masts of the captured Roman ships, when the Cretan generals Lasthenes and Panares steered back in triumph to Cydonia from the naval combat in which they had engaged the Romans off their island. Antonius, after having squandered immense sums and accomplished not the slightest result by his inconsiderate mode of warfare, died in  $\frac{683}{71}$  at Crete. The bad success of his expedition,

70

the costliness of building a fleet, and the repugnance of the olicarchy to confer any powers of a more comprehensive kind on the magistrates, led them, after the practical termination of this enterprise by Antonius' death, to make no farther norming tion of an admiral in chief, and to revert to the old system of leaving each governor to look after the suppression of piracy in his own province the fleet equipped by Lucullus for in stance (p 53) was actively employed for this purpose in the Aegean sea. So far however as the Cretans were concerned, a disgrace like that endured off Cydonia seemed even to the degenerate Romans of this age as if it could be answered only by a declaration of war. Yet the Cretan envoys, who in the year " appeared in Rome solicating that the prisoners mucht be taken back and the old alliance re-established, had almost obtained a favourable decree of the senate, what the whole corporation termed a disgrace, the individual senator was ready to sell for a substantial price. It was not till a formal resolution of the senate rendered the loans of the Cretan envoys among the Roman bankers non-actionable-that is, not until the senate had incapacitated itself for undergoing bribers-that a decree nassed to the effect that the Cretan communities, if they wished to avo d war, should hand over not only the Roman deserters but the authors of the outrage perpetrated off Cyclorus-the leaders Lasthenes and Panares-to the Romans for befitting . - " " h as and boats of four or more I should nay a fine of 4000

. . s declared that they were not empowered to enter in usa ' mis, one of the consult of the next year was appointed to depart on the expin of his of cual term for Crete, in order either to recene there what was

demanded or to bern the war

Accordingly in the processal Quarter Metel as appeared in the Cretan waters. The corrementers of the nite i with the larger towns Gortyna Chossus Cydonia at there head were resolved rather to delend themselves in arms than to salmat to those excessive deriands. The Cream were a netamous and accommate people (i. 61) with whose public and private ex steree piracs was as intimately assecuted as teldery with the commonwealth of the Actolians, but ther meen ind the Actolians in valour as in many other respects and accordingly these two were the only Greek common bys that waged a courageous and bonoutains simusals for informations. At Cydonia, where Metellus landed his three legions, a Cretan army of 24,000 men under Lasthenes and Panares was ready to receive him; a battle took place in the open field, in which the victory after a hard struggle remained with the Romans. Nevertheless the towns bade defiance from behind their walls to the Roman general; Metellus had to make up his mind to besiege them in succession. First Cydonia, in which the remains of the beaten army had taken refuge, was after a long siege surrendered by Panares in return for the promise of a free departure for himself. Lasthenes, who had escaped from the town, had to be besieged a second time in Cnossus; and, when this fortress also was on the point of falling, he destroyed its treasures and escaped once more to places which still continued their defence. such as Lyctus, Eleutherna, and others. Two years  $\binom{6,86}{65}$ ,  $\binom{6,87}{65}$ clapsed before Metellus became master of the whole island, and the last spot of free Greek soil thereby passed under the control of the dominant Romans; the Cretan communities, as they were the first of all Greek commonwealths to develop the free urban constitution and the dominion of the sea, were also to be the last of all the Greek maritime states formerly filling the Mediterranean to succumb to the Roman continental power.

All the legal conditions were fulfilled for celebrating another of the usual pompous triumphs; the gens of the Metelli could add to its Macedonian, Numidian, Dalmatian, Balearic titles with equal right to the new title of Cretieus, and Rome possessed another name of pride. Nevertheless the power of the Romans in the Mediterranean was never lower, that of the corsairs never higher than in those years. Well might the Cilieians and Cretans of the seas, who are said to have numbered at this time 1000 ships, mock the Isauricus and the Creticus, and their empty victories. With what effect the pirates interfered in the Mithradatic war, and how the obstinate resistance of the Pontic maritime towns derived its best resources from the corsair-state has been already related. But that state transacted business on a hardly less grand seale on its own behoof. Almost under the eyes of the fleet of Lucullus, the pirate Athenodorus surprised in  $\frac{685}{69}$  the island of Delos, destroyed its far-famed shrines and temples, and carried off the whole population into slavery. The island Lipara near Sicily paid to the pirates a fixed tribute annually, to remain exempt from like attacks. Another pirate chief Heracleon destroyed in 682 the squadron equipped in Sicily against him, and ventured with no more than four open boats to sail into the harbour of Syracuse. Two years later his colleague Pyrganion even landed at the same port, established himself there and sent forth flying parties into the island, till the Roman governor at last compelled him to re-embark People grew at length quite accustomed to the fact that all the provinces equipped squadrons and raised coastruards, or were ot any rate taxed for both; and yet the pirates appeared to plunder the provinces with as much regularity as the Roman governors. But even the sacred soil of Italy was now no longer respected by the shameless transgressors. from Croton they carned off with them the temple-treasures of the Lacuity Hera: they landed in Brundisium, Misenim, Careta in the Etriscan norts, even in Ostia itself, they seized the most eminent Roman officers as captives, among others the admiral of the Cherry army and two oractors with their whole retinue, with the dreaded fasces themselves and all the insignia of their dignity: they - 1 or from a villa at Misenum the very sister of the

in this case the epithet may have been appropriate.

We have already described how the senate restored his Sillicarned out its guardianship of the frontier in Macedonia, its discipline over the client kings of Asia Minor, its manne pelice; the results were nowhere satisfactory. Nor did better success attend the powerment in another and perhaps even more treath matter, the supervision of the provincial, and above all of the Italian profetanate. The gaugene in a star productive gained at the vitals of all the starts of antiquity, and the more so, the more vigorously they I ad men and prospettil, I is the power and nothes of the starte regularly led, under the existing circumstruces, to a disproportionate increase of the look of slaves. Rome naturally suffered more severely from this case than any other state of antiquity. Per the powerment of the sixth century had from under the necessity of sufficient sixth century had from nature the necessity of sufficient against the gains of manage heatigners and treat days. To-plantation system, spreading more as I man a song the I sain speculators, had infinitely increased the dangerous evil: in the time of the Gracchan and Marian crises and in close connection with them servile revolts had taken place at numerous points of the Roman empire, and in Sicily had even grown into two bloody wars  $\binom{610-622}{136-732}$  and  $\binom{600}{102-700}$ ; iii. 76-78, 131-134). But the ten years of the rule of the restoration after Sulla's death formed the golden age both for the buccaneers at sea and for bands of a similar character on land, above all in the Italian peninsula, which had hitherto been comparatively well regulated. The land could hardly be said any longer to enjoy peace. In the capital and the less populous districts of Italy robberies were of every-day occurrence, murders were frequent. A special decree of the people was issued—perhaps at this epoch—against kid-napping of foreign slaves and of free men; a special summary action was about this time introduced against violent deprivation of landed property. These crimes could not but appear specially dangerous, because, while they were usually perpetrated by the proletariate, the higher class were to a great extent also concerned in them as moral originators and partakers in the gain. The abduction of men and of estates was very frequently suggested by the overseers of the large estates and carried out by the gangs of slaves, frequently armed, that were collected there: and many a man even of high respectability did not disdain what one of his officious slave-overseers thus acquired for him as Mephistopheles acquired for Faust the lime-trees of Philemon. The state of things is shown by the aggravated punishment for outrages on property committed by armed bands, which was introduced by one of the better Optimates, Marcus Lucullus, as presiding over the administration of justice in the capital about the year  $\frac{6.7.6}{7.8}$ , with the express object of inducing the proprietors of large bands of slaves to exercise a more strict superintendence over them and thereby avoid the penalty of seeing them judicially condemned. Where pillage and murder were thus carried on by order of the world of quality, it was natural for these masses of slaves and proletarians to prosecute the same business on their own account; a spark was sufficient to set fire to so inflammable materials, and to convert the proletariate into an insurrectionary army. An occasion was soon found.

The gladiatorial games, which now held the first rank among the popular amusements in Italy, had led to the institution of

&lt;sup>1</sup> These enactments gave rise to the conception of robbery as a separate crime, while the older law comprehended robbery under theft.

of the sovereign multitude. These were naturally in great part brave men captured in war, who had not forgotten that they had once faced the Romans in the field. A number of these desperadoes broke out of one of the Capuan gladritorial schools ("13"), and sought refuge on Yount Vesturus. At their head were two Celts, who are designated by their slave names Crivus and Genomius and the Thracian Spartacus. The litter perhaps a scient of the noble family of the Spartocids which attained even to royal honours in its Thracian home and in Panticapreum, had served among the Thracian auxiliants in the Roman army, had deserted and gove as a highand to the mountains and had been there recipitated and destined for the cladiatorial cames.

The paroads of this little hand, numberon at first only seventy four persons but rapidly swelling by concourse from the surrounding country soon became so tmublesome to the rihabitants of the rich recion of Compania, that these, after having sainly attempted themselves to repel them, sought help against them from Rome A division of 3000 men h tred's collected appeared under the leadership of Clodius Glaber, and occup ed the approaches of Lesuvius with the view of starving out it " But the brigands in spite of their small number and the r defective armament had the holdness to scramb'e down s'eep declivities and to full upon the Roman posts, and when the wretched militia saw the little band of desperadoes mexpectally ascal them, they took to their heels and fled en all si les This first success procured for the robbers arms and large accessions to their ranks. Although even now a great portion of them carried nothing but pointed clubs, the new and stronger divish t of the militin-two legions under the practor Put has harm ofwhich advanced Imm Romeinto Campania I end themer carped almost like a regular array in the plan Varanta had a di Toult position His militia, compelled to invouse opposite the event, were severely weakered by the damp autumn weather and the diseases which it engendered, and, worse than the epil mire, cowardice and invilored nation th aned the ranks. At the very outset ore of his designed role up entirely, so that the faptions d d not fall back on the man come, but were complet hope Thereupon, when the order was given to advance against the energy a entermethments and arrack them, the Erestor ferring of the troops refused to comply with it. Nevertheless Varinius set out with those who kept their ground against the robberband; but it was no longer to be found where he sought it. It had broken up in the deepest silence and had turned to the south towards Picentia (Vicenza near Amalfi), where Varinius overtook it, but could not prevent it from retiring over the Silarus to the interior of Lucania, the chosen land of shepherds and robbers. Varinius followed thither, and there at length the despised enemy arrayed themselves for battle. All the circumstances under which the combat took place were to the disadvantage of the Romans: the soldiers, vehemently as they had demanded battle a little before, fought ill; Varinius was completely vanquished; his horse and the insignia of his official dignity fell with the Roman camp itself into the enemy's hand. The south-Italian slaves, especially the brave half-savage herdsmen, flocked in crowds to the banner of the deliverers who had so unexpectedly appeared; according to the most moderate estimates the number of armed insurgents rose to 40,000 men. Campania, just evacuated, was speedily reoccupied, and the Roman corps which was left behind there under Gaius Thoranius, the quaestor of Varinius, was broken and destroyed. In the whole south and south-west of Italy the open country was in the hands of the victorious bandit-chiefs; even considerable towns, such as Consentia in the Bruttian country, Thurii and Metapontum in Lucania, Nola and Nuceria in Campania, were stormed by them, and suffered all the atrocities which victorious barbarians could inflict on defenceless civilised men, and unshackled slaves on their former masters. That a conflict like this should be altogether abnormal and more a massacre than a war, was unhappily a matter of course: the masters duly crucified every captured slave; the slaves naturally killed their prisoners also, or with still more sarcastic retaliation even compelled their Roman captives to slaughter each other in gladiatorial sport; as was subsequently done with three hundred of them at the obsequies of a robber-captain who had fallen in combat.

In Rome people were with reason apprehensive as to the destructive power of a conflagration which was daily spreading. It was resolved next year  $\binom{6.82}{72}$  to send both consuls against the formidable leaders of the gang. The practor Quintus Arrius, a lieutenant of the consul Lucius Gellius, actually succeeded in seizing and destroying at Mount Garganus in Apulia the Celtic band, which under Crixus had separated from the mass of the robber-army and was levying contributions for itself. But Spartacus achieved all the more brilliant victories in the Apennines and in northern Italy, where first the consul Gnaeus Lentu-

Cassius (consul 681) and the practor Gnacus Manlius, one after another succumbed to his blows. The scarcely armed canes of slaves were the terror of the legions; the series of defeats recalled the first years of the Hannibolic war.

What might have come of it, had the national kines from the mountains of Auverene or of the Balkan, and not runanay gladiatorial slaves, been at the head of the victorious bands. it is impossible to say; as it was, the movement remained not-withstanding its brilliant victories a rising of robbers, and succumbed less to the superior force of its opponents than to internal discord and the nant of regular plan. The unity in confronting the common foe, which was so remarkably overspicuous in the earlier servile wars of Sicily, was wanting in this Italian war-a difference probably due to the fact that. while the Sicilian slaves found a quest national point of union in the common Syrohellenism, the Italian slaves were senarated into the two bodies of Helleno-Barbarians and Celto-Germans. The rupture between the Celtic Crixus and the Thracian Scartacus-Denomaus had fallen in one of the earliest conflicts-and other similar quarrels hindered them from turning the successes achieved to good account, and procured for the Romans teveral important victories. But the want of a definite plan and aim produced far more injunous effects on the enterprise than the insubordination of the Celto Germans. Spartacus doubtles:to judge by the little which we learn regarding that remarks able man-stood in this respect above his party. Along with his strategic ability he displayed no ordinary talent for organisation, as indeed from the very outset the uprightness with which he presided over his band and distributed the sp. J had directed the eves of the multitude to I 'm qui'e at much at least as his valour. To remedy the severely f-ic mant of casa'ry and of arms, he tried with the help of the herds of heres seured in Lower Italy to train and discipline a cavalry, and, so a co as he got the port of Thurn are his hards, to present to that quarter iron and copper, dutaless through the medical of the prates. But he was made in the man to induce the wild birder where he led to pursue any defer to ultered amu

the Romans took from Spartacus the stipulated hire without performing the service for which it was given Crassus mean performing the service for which it was given classes mean while had followed the robber army nearly as far as the mouth of the Crathis, and, like Scipio before Numantia, ordered his at the construct.

h of thirty two miles, which shut m the rest of Italy, intercented

the insurgent army on the sturn from Rhegium, and cut off its supplies But in a dark winter night Spartacus broke through the lines of the enemy, and in the spring of " was once more in Lucania The laborious work had thus been in vain Crassus began to despair of accomplishing his task and demanded that the senate should for his support recall to Italy the armies stationed in Macedonia under Marcus Lucullus and in Hither

Spain under Gnaeus Pompeius

This extreme step however was not needed, the disunion and the arrogance of the robber bands sufficed again to frustrate their successes. Once more the Celts and Germans broke off from the learne of which the Thracian was the head and soul in order that, under leaders of their own nation Cannicus and Castus, they might separately fall victims to the sword of the Romans Once, at the Lucaman lake, the opportune appearance of Spartneys saved them, and thereupon they pitched their camp near to his, nevertheless Crassus succeeded in giving employment to Sparticus by means of the cavalry, and mean while surrounded the Celtic bands and compelled them to a separate engagement, in which the whole body-numbering it is said 12,300 combatants—fell fighting brasely all on the spot and with their wounds in front Spartacus then attemp ed to throw himself with his division into the mountains round Petelia (near Strongoli in Calabria) and signally defeated the Roman vanguard, which followed his retreat But this victory proved more injurious to the victor than to the vanquished Intoxicated by success, the robbers refused to retreat farther, and compelled their general to lead them through Lucania towards Apulia to face the last decisive struggle

As the Line was thirty-two in less long (Saliest Hist ly 19 Dictieb Flutarch Crass 10) it probably passed not from Squ Jaco to Fizzo 111 more to the north, somewhere new Castrovillari and Cassany over the reninsula which is here in a a raight line about twenty seven mi or tread. That Crassus was invested with the su remembered in "12" 12 come from the setting aside of the consu s (Patarth Cran to) that the will tel of an amen's was sport by the swearn exactle firstian wall for we from the srowy right " (but I of battle Spartacus stabbed his horse: as in prosperity and adversity he had faithfully kept by his men, he now by that act showed them that the issue for him and for all was victory or death. In the battle he fought with the courage of a lion; two centurions fell by his hand; wounded and on his knees he still wielded his spear against the assailing foe. Thus the great robber-captain and with him the best of his comrades died the death of free men and of honourable soldiers  $(\frac{683}{71})$ . After the dearly-bought victory the troops who had achieved it, and those of Pompeius that had meanwhile after conquering the Sertorians arrived from Spain, instituted throughout Apulia and Lucania a manhunt, such as there had never been before, to crush out the last sparks of the mighty conflagration. Although in the southern districts, where for instance the little town of Tempsa was seized in  $\frac{683}{71}$  by a gang of robbers, and in Etruria, which was severely affected by Sulla's evictions, there was by no means as yet general tranquillity, peace was officially considered as re-established in Italy. At least the disgracefully lost eagles were recovered-after the victory over the Celts alone five of them were brought in; and along the road from Capua to Rome the six thousand crosses bearing captured slaves testified to the re-establishment of order, and to the renewed victory of acknowledged right over its living property that had rebelled.

Let us look back on the events which fill up the decennium of the Sullan restoration. No one of the movements, external or internal, which occurred during this period-neither the insurrection of Lepidus, nor the enterprises of the Spanish emigrants, nor the wars in Thrace and Macedonia and in Asia Minor, nor the risings of the pirates and the slaves—constituted of itself a great danger necessarily affecting the life-springs of the nation; and yet the state had in all these struggles wellnigh fought for its very existence. The reason was that the tasks were everywhere left unperformed, so long as they might still have been performed with ease; the neglect of the simplest precautionary measures produced the most dreadful mischiefs and misfortunes, and transformed dependent classes and impotent kings into antagonists on a footing of equality. The democracy and the servile insurrection were doubtless subdued; but such as the victories were, the victor was neither inwardly elated nor outwardly strengthened by them. It was no credit to Rome, that the two most celebrated generals of the government-party had during a struggle of eight years marked by more defeats than victories failed to master the insurgent chief

Sertorius and his Spanish guerillas, and that it was only the dagger of his friends that decided the Sertorian war in farour of the legitimate government. As to the slaves, it was far less an honour to have conquered them than a disgrace to have been nitted against them in equal strife for years Little more than a century had clapsed since the Hannibahe war, it must have brought a blush to the cheek of the honourable Roman, when he reflected on the fearfully rapid decline of the nation since that great age. Then the Italian slaves stood like a wall against the veterans of Hannibal, now the Italian militia were scattered like chaff before the bludgeons of their runaway seris. Then every plain captain acted in case of need as general, and fought often without success, but always with honour, now it was difficult to find among all the officers of runk a leader of even ordinary efficiency Then the government preferred to take the last farmer from the plough rather than forego the acquisition of Spain and Greece, now they were on the eve of again abandon-- long since acquired, merely that they might be ing able 'nsurgent slaves at home Sprann from the Po to the Sicinus ratis, beaten both consults, and threatened Rome with blockade, the enterprise which it required the greatest general of antiquity to undertake against the Rome of former days could be undertaken against the Rome of the present by a daring captain of bandity. Was there any wonder that no fresh like source out of such victories by the strange out of such victories by the strange out of such victories by the strange out of such victories.

wonger that no iresh life spra insurrents and robber-chiefs?

The external wars, however, had produced a result still less satisfactory It is true that the Theaco-Macedonian war yielded a result not directly unfavourable, although far from corresponding to the considerable expenditure of men and money. In the wars in Asia Minor and with the pirates on the other hand, the government had exhibited utter failure. The former ended with the loss of the whole conquests made in eight bloods campaigns, the latter with the total driving of the Remans from "their own sea." Once Rome, fully conscious of the irresistibleness of her power by land, had transferred her superiority also to the other element, now the mighty state was powerless at sea and, as it seemed, on the point of losing its dem mon at least over the Asiatic continent. The material berefits which a state exists to confer-security of frontier, undusturbed percelul intercourse, legal protection, and regulated administration-began all of there to want't for the who'e of the nations united in the Roman state; the gods of blessing seemed all to have ascended to Olympus and to have left the miserable earth at the mercy of official or volunteer plunderers and tormentors. Nor was this decay of the state felt as a public misfortune merely perhaps by such as had political rights and public spirit; the insurrection of the proletariate, and the brigandage and piracy which remind us of the times of the Neapolitan Ferdinands, carried the sense of this decay into the remotest valley and the humblest hut of Italy, and made every one who pursued trade and commerce, or who bought even a bushel of wheat, feel it as a personal calamity.

If enquiry was made as to the authors of this dreadful and unexampled misery, it was not difficult to charge the blame of it with good reason on many. The slaveholders whose heart was in their money-bags, the insubordinate soldiers, the generals cowardly, incapable, or foolhardy, the demagogues of the market-place mostly pursuing a mistaken aim, bore their share of the blame; or, to speak more truly, who was there that did not share it? It was instinctively felt that this misery, this disgrace, this disorder were too colossal to be the work of any one man. As the greatness of the Roman commonwealth was the work not of prominent individuals, but rather of a soundlyorganised community of burgesses, so the decay of this mighty structure was the result not of the destructive genius of individuals, but of a general disorganisation. The great majority of the burgesses were good for nothing, and every rotten stone in the building helped to bring about the ruin of the whole; the whole nation suffered for what was the whole nation's fault. It was unjust to hold the government, as the ultimate tangible organ of the state, responsible for all its curable and incurable diseases; but it certainly was true that the government shared to a very grave extent the general culpability. In the Asiatic war, for example, where no individual of the ruling lords conspicuously failed, and Lucullus, in a military point of view at least, behaved with ability and even glory, it was all the more clear that the blame of failure lay in the system and in the government as such-mainly, so far as that war was concerned, in the remissness with which Cappadocia and Syria were at first abandoned, and in the awkward position of the able general with reference to a governing college incapable of any energetic resolution. In maritime police likewise the true idea which the senate had taken up as to a general hunting out of the pirates was first spoilt by it in the execution and then totally dropped, in order to revert to the old foolish system of sending legions against the coursers of the seas The expeditions of Servilus and Marcius to Cilicia, and of Metellus to Crete, were undertaken on this system. and in accordance with it Triarius had the island of Delos surrounded by a wall for protection against the pirates Such attempts to secure the dominion of the seas remind us of the Persian great king, who ordered the sea to be scourged with rods to make it subject to him Doubtless therefore the nation had good reason for laying the blame of its failure primarily on the government of the restoration A similar misrule had indeed previously accompanied the re-establishment of the oligarchy, after the fall of the Gracchi as after that of Marius and Saturninus, yet never before had it borne itself with such violence and at the same time such laxity, never had it appeared so corrupt and permicious But, when a government cannot govern, it ceases to be legitimate, and whoever has the power has also the right to overthrow it. It is, no doubt, unhappily true that an incapable and flagitious government may for a long period trample under foot the welfare and honour of the land, before the men are found who are able and willing to will against that government the formidable weapons of its own forging, and to evoke out of the moral revolt of the good and the distress of the many the revolution which such circumstances legitimise. But if the game with the fortunes of nations may be a merry one and may be played perhaps for a long time without molestation, it is a treacherous game, which in its own time entraps the players, and no one then blames the axe, if it is laid to the root of the tree that bears such fruits. For the Roman oligarchy this time had now come The Pontic-Armenian war and the affair of the pirates became the proximate grounds for the overthrow of the Sullan constitution and for the establishment of a revolutionary military dictatorship

CHAPTER III

THE FALL OF THE OLIGARCHY AND THE RULE OF POMPEIUS

THE Sullan constitution still stood unshaken. The assault, which Lepidus and Sertorius had ventured to make on it, had been repulsed with little loss. The government had neglected, it is true, to finish the half-completed building in the energetic spirit of its author. It is characteristic of the government, that it neither distributed the lands which Sulla had destined for allotment but had not yet parcelled out, nor directly abandoned the claim to them, but tolerated the former owners in provisional possession without regulating their title, and indeed even allowed various still undistributed tracts of Sullan domainland to be arbitrarily taken possession of by individuals according to the old system of occupation which was de jure and de facto set aside by the Gracchan reforms (iii. 336). Whatever in the Sullan enactments was indifferent or inconvenient for the Optimates, was without scruple ignored or cancelled; for instance, the sentences by which whole communities were deprived of the state-franchise, the prohibition against conjoining the new farms, and several of the charters conferred by Sulla on particular communities-naturally, however, without giving back to the communities the sums paid for these exemptions. But though these violations of the ordinances of Sulla by the government itself contributed to shake the foundations of his structure, the Sempronian laws were substantially abolished and remained so.

There was no lack, indeed, of men who had in view the reestablishment of the Gracchan constitution, or of projects to attain piecemeal in the way of constitutional reform what Lepidus and Sertorius had attempted by the path of revolution. The government had already under the pressure of the agitation of Lepidus immediately after the death of Sulla consented to a limited revival of the largesses of grain  $\binom{6.7 \, 6}{78}$ ; and it did, moreover, what it could to satisfy the proletariate of the capital in regard to this vital question. When, notwithstanding those distributions, the high price of grain occasioned chiefly by piracy produced so oppressive a dearth in Rome as to lead to a violent turnult in the streets in 679, extraordinary purchases of Sicilian grain on account of the government relieved for the time the most severe distress, and a corn law brought in by the consuls of Cal regulated for the future the purchases of Sicilian grun and furnished the government, although at the expense of the provincials, with better means of obviating similar evils But the less material points of difference also—the restoration of the tribunician power in its old compass, and the setting iside of the senatorial tribunals—ceased not to form subjects of popular agitation, and in their case the government offered more decided resistance. The dispute regarding the tribunician magistracy was opened as early as 42%, immediately after the defeat of Lenidus, by the tribune of the people Lucius Sicinius perhaps a descendant of the man of the same name who had first filled this office more than four hundred years before, but it failed before the apposition made to it by the netice consul Gaius Curio In 440 Lucius Ounctius resumed the agitation, but was induced by the authority of the consul Lucius Lucullus to desist from his purpose. The matter was taken up in the following year with greater zeal by Gaius Licinius Macer, whom a way characteristic of the period-carned his literary studies into public life, and counselled the burresses, just as he had read in the Annals, to refuse the conscription

83

Complaints also, only too well founded, prevailed respecting the bad administration of justice by the senatorial jurymen. The condemnation of a man of any influence could hardly be obtained. Not only did colleague feel reasonable compassion for colleague, those who had been or were likely to be accured for the poor sinner under accusation at the moment, the side also of the votes of jurymen was hardly any longer exceptional Several senators had been judicially convicted of this rimer men pointed with the finger at others equally guilty, the most respected Optimates, such as Quinties Caulis, granted in the open senate that the complaints were quite well founded, and all specially striking cases compelled the senate on

allowed to sl p out of

had subsided any use i ... allowed to all port of sight. The consequences of this wretched administration of justice appeared especially in a system of plurdening and torturing the provincials, compared with which previous out research even seemed tolerable and moderate beating and robbing had been in some measure legistrated in custom, the commission on extortions might be regarded as an institution for taxing the senators returning from the provinces for the benefit of their colleagues that remained at home. But when a respectable Siceliot, because he had not been ready to help the governor in a crime, was by the latter condemned to death in his absence and unheard: when even Roman burgesses, if they were not equites or senators, were in the provinces no longer safe from the rods and axes of the Roman magistrate, and the oldest acquired right of the Roman democracy-security of life and person-began to be trodden under foot by the ruling oligarchy; then even the public in the Forum at Rome had an ear for the complaints regarding its magistrates in the provinces, and regarding the unjust judges who morally shared the responsi-bility of such misdeeds. The opposition of course did not omit to assail its opponents in-what was almost the only ground left to it—the tribunals. The young Gaius Caesar, who also, so far as his age allowed, took zealous part in the agitation for the revival of the tribunieian power, brought to trial in 4.7.7 one of the most distinguished partisans of Sulla the consular Gnaeus Dolabella, and in the following year another Sullan officer Gaius Antonius; and Marcus Cicero in  $\frac{c_1 s_1}{70}$  called to account Gaius Verres, one of the most wretched of the creatures of Sulla, and one of the worst scourges of the provincials. Again and again were the pictures of that dark period of the proseriptions, the fearful sufferings of the provincials, the disgraceful state of Roman criminal justice, unfolded before the assembled multitude with all the parade of Italian rhetoric, and with all the bitterness of Italian sareasm, and the mighty dead as well as his living instruments were unrelentingly exposed to their wrath and seorn. The re-establishment of the full tribunieian power, with the continuance of which the freedom, might, and prosperity of the republic seemed bound up as by a charm of primeval sacredness, the reintroduction of the "stern" equestrian tribunals, the renewal of the eensorship, which Sulla had set aside, for the purifying of the supreme governing board from its corrupt and pernicious elements, were daily demanded with a loud voice by the orators of the popular party.

But with all this no progress was made. There was seandal and outcry enough, but no real result was attained by this exposure of the government according to and beyond its deserts. The material power still lay, so long as there was no military interference, in the hands of the burgesses of the capital; and the "people" that thronged the streets of Rome and made manstrates and laws in the Forum, was in fact nowise better than the governing senate The government no doubt had to come to terms with the multitude, where its own immediate merest was at stake, this was the reason for the renewal of the Semproman corn law But it was not to be imagined that this nopulace would display earnestness on behalf of an idea or even of a judicious reform What Demosthenes said of his Athenians was justly applied to the Romans of this period—the people were very zealous for action, so long as they stood round the platform and listened to proposals of reforms, but when they went home, no one thought further of what he had heard in the market place. However those democratic agitators might stir the fire, it was to no purpose, for the inflammable material was wanting The government knew this, and allowed no concession to be wrung from it on important questions of principle, at the utmost it consented about "2 to grant amnesty to a portion of those who had become exiles with Lenidus Any concessions that did take place, came not so much from the pressure of the democracy as from the attempts at med ation of the moderate aristocracy But of the two lans

h concerned the tribunals ir, and the second, which those who had held the abolished the Suma cross those who had held the tribunate should be disqualified for undertaking other magis tracies, but allowed the other limitations to continue, metal-excited—like every half measure—the displeasure of both parties. The party of conservatives friendly to reform which lost its most emment head by the early death of Cotta occurring soon after (about "-2") downled away more and more—crushed between the extremes, which were becoming daily more marked. But of these the party of the government, wretched and indolent as it was necessarily retained the advantage in presence of the equally wretched and equally modent opposition.

To this state of matters so fivourable to the government.

this state of matters so favourable to the government distinctly lose of its participant the text of honeur

 officially regarded. The breach already apparent had been widened irreparably during the Spanish campaigns of the general  $(\frac{677-683}{17-11})$ . With reluctance and semi-compulsion the government had associated him as colleague with their true representative Quintus Metellus; and in turn he accused the senate, probably not without ground, of having by its neglect of the Spanish armies, whether from carelessness or malice, occasioned their defeats and placed the fortunes of the expedition in jeopardy. Now he returned as victor over his open and his secret foes, at the head of an army inured to war and wholly devoted to him, requiring assignments of land for his soldiers, a triumph and consulship for himself. The latter demands came into collision with the law. Pompeius, although several times invested in an extraordinary way with supreme official authority, had not yet filled any ordinary magistracy, not even the quaestorship, and was still not a member of the senate; and none but one who had passed through the round of lesser ordinary magistracies could be consul, none but one who had been invested with the ordinary supreme power could triumph. The senate was legally entitled, if he became a candidate for the consulship, to bid him begin with the quaestorship; if he requested a triumph, to remind him of the great Scipio, who under like circumstances had renounced his triumph over conquered Spain. Nor was Pompeius less dependent constitutionally on the good will of the senate as respected the lands promised to his soldiers. But, although the senate—as with its feebleness even in animosity was very conceivable-should yield those points and concede to the victorious general in return for his acting as executioner against the democratic chiefs the triumph, the consulate, and the assignations of land, an honourable annihilation in senatorial indolence among the long series of peaceful senatorial imperatores was the most favourable lot which the oligarchy was able to assign to the general of thirtysix. That which his heart really longed for-the command in the Mithradatic war-he could never expect to obtain from the voluntary bestowal of the senate: in their own well-understood interest the oligarchy could not permit him to add to his African and European trophies those of a third continent; the laurels which were to be plucked copiously and easily in the East were reserved at all events for the pure aristocracy. But if the celebrated general did not find his account in the ruling oligarchy, there remained—for neither was the time ripe, nor was the temperament of Pompeius at all fitted, for a purely personal out-

seemed

snoken dynastic policy-no alternative save to make common cause with the democratic party No special interest bound him to the Sullan constitution, he could pursue his personal objects mute as well, if not better, with one more democratic On the other hand he found all that he needed in the demo cratic party Its active and adroit leaders were ready and able to relieve the helpless and somewhat ankward hero of the trouble of political leadership, and yet much too insignificant to be able or even willing to dispute with the celebrated general the first place and especially the military supremacy Even Gains Caesar, by far the most important of them, was simply a young man whose daring exploits and fashionable debts far more than his fiery democratic eloquence had gained him a name, and who could not but feel himself greatly honoured when the world renowned Imperator allowed him to be his political adjutant That popularity, to which men like Pompeius, with pretensions greater than their abilities, usually attach more value than they are willing to confess, could not but fall in the highest measure to the lot of the young general whose r himself

other considerable chiefs of the opposition it would depend solely on Pompeius himself to determine his future position And of this much there could hardly be a doubt, that the accession of the general of the army, which had just returned victorious from Spain and still stood unbroken in Italy, to the party of opposition must have as its consequence the Isl of the existing order of things. Government and opposition were equally powerless, so soon as the latter no longer fought merely with the weapons of declamation, but had the sword of a victorious general ready to back its demands, the povernment would be overcome at all events, and that perhaps even without a struzgle

Pompeius and the democrats thus found themselves urped into coalition. Personal dislikings were probally not wanting on either side at was not possible that the victorieus general could love the street orators, nor could these hall with pleasure as their chief the executioner of Carbo and Bru'us, but policial necessity outweighed at least for the moment all moral scrup'es

The democrats and Pompeus, however, were r t the's le parties to the league Marcus Crassus was in a similar situation with Pompeius. Although a Sullan like the latter, his politics were quite as in the case of Pompeius pre-eminently of a personal kind, and by no means those of the ruling oligarchy; and he too was now in Italy at the head of a large and victorious army, with which he had just suppressed the slave insurrection. had to choose whether he would ally himself with the oligarchy against the coalition, or enter that coalition: he chose the latter, which was doubtless the safer course. With his colossal wealth and his influence on the clubs of the capital he was in any case a valuable ally; but under existing circumstances it was an incalculable gain, when the only army, with which the senate could have met the troops of Pompeius, joined the attacking force. The democrats moreover, who were probably somewhat uneasy at their alliance with that too powerful general, were not displeased to see a counterpoise and perhaps a future rival associated with him in the person of Marcus Crassus.

Thus in the summer of  $\frac{6.83}{71}$  the first coalition took place between the democracy on the one hand, and the two Sullan generals Gnaeus Pompeius and Marcus Crassus on the other. The generals adopted the party-programme of the democracy; and they were promised immediately in return the consulship for the coming year, while Pompeius was to have also a triumph and the desired allotments of land for his soldiers, and Crassus as the conqueror of Spartacus at least the honour of a solemn entrance into the capital.

To the two Italian armies, the great capitalists, and the democracy, which thus came forward in league for the overthrow of the Sullan constitution, the senate had nothing to oppose save perhaps the second Spanish army under Quintus Metellus Pius. But Sulla had truly predicted that what he did would not be done a second time; Metellus, by no means inclined to involve himself in a civil war, had discharged his soldiers immediately after crossing the Alps. So nothing was left for the oligarchy but to submit to what was inevitable. The senate granted the dispensations requisite for the consulship and triumph; Pompeius and Crassus were, without opposition, elected consuls for 684, while their armies, on pretext of awaiting their trumph, encamped before the city. Pompeius thereupon, even before entering on office, gave his public and formal adherence to the democratic programme in an assembly of the people held by the tribune Marcus Lollius Palicanus. The change of the constitution was thus in principle decided.

They now set to work in earnest to abolish the Sullan institutions First of all the tribunician magistracy regained its earlier authority. Pompeius himself as consul introduced the law which gave back to the tribunes of the people their time-honoured prerogatives, and in particular the initiatise of legislation—a singular gift indeed, from the hand of a man who had done more than any one living to wrest from the community its ancient proplems.

With respect to the jury tribunals, the regulation of Sulls, that the roll of the senators was to serve as the list of jurymen, was abolished, but this by no means led to a simple restoration of the Gracchan equestran courts. In future—it was enacted by the new Aurelian law—the colleges of jurymen were to consist one third of senators and two-thirds of men of equestran census, and of the latter the half must have filled the office of district presidents (the so-called tribum arraris). This last

were indirectly

derived from the elections of he reason, again, why the senate was not totally excluded from the tribunals is probably to be sought partly in the relations of Crassus to the senate, partly in the accession of the senatorial middle party it the coalition, with which is doubless connected the circumstance that this law was brought in by the practor Lucius Cotta, the brother of their lately deceased leader

Not less important was the abolition of the arrangements as to taxation established for Asia by Sulla (iii 337), which in all probability likewise took place this year. The governor of Asia at that time, Lucius Lucullus, was directed to re-establish the system of farming the revenue introduced by Gaius Gracchus, and thus this important source of money and power was restored to the creat capitalists.

Lastly, not only was the censorship renewed, but pinkably at the same time the earlier limitation of the magniturely to a term of eighteen months was abolished, and the censors were allowed, in case they found it necessary, to hold offee for five years—the professedly original term, namely that assigned to the first pair of censors in the Annuls i disfied in the interest of democracy. The elections which the rew contrils fixed shortly after entering on their office fell, in evident mockey of the senate, on the two consuls of $\frac{1}{2}$, Gracus L'itulis. Clodianus and Leurus Cellinus, who had been removed by the tenate from their commands on account of their writched management of the war against Spartacus (p. 76). It may readily be conceived that these men put in motion all the means which their important and grave office placed at their command, for the purpose of doing homage to the new holders of power and of annoying the senate. At least an eighth part of the senate, sixty-four senators, a number hitherto unparalleled, were deleted from the roll, including Gaius Antonius, formerly impeached without success by Gaius Caesar (p. 85), Publius Lentulus Sura, the consul of 683, and in all probability not a few of the most obnoxious creatures of Sulla.

CHAP. III.

Thus in  $\frac{684}{70}$  they had reverted in the main to the arrangements that subsisted before the Sullan restoration. Again the multitude of the capital was fed from the state-chest, in other words from the provinces; again the tribunician authority gave to every demagogue a legal licence to overturn the arrangements of the state; again the moneyed nobility, as farmers of the revenue and possessed of the judicial control over the governors, raised their heads alongside of the government as powerfully as ever; again the senate trembled before the verdict of jurymen of the equestrian order and before the censorial censure. The system of Sulla, which had based the monopoly of power by the nobility on the political annihilation of the mercantile aristocracy and of demagogism, was thus completely overthrown. Leaving out of view some subordinate enactments the abolition of which was not overtaken till afterwards, such as the restoration of the right of self-completion to the priestly colleges (iii. 341), nothing of the general ordinances of Sulla survived except on the one hand concessions which he himself found it necessary to make to the opposition, such as the recognition of the Roman citizenship of all the Italians, and, on the other hand, enactments without any marked partisan tendency, and with which therefore even judicious democrats found no fault-such as, among others, the restriction of the freedmen, the regulation of the functions of the magistrates. and the material alterations in criminal law.

The coalition was more agreed regarding these questions of principle than with respect to the personal questions which such a political revolution raised. As might be expected, the democrats were not content with the general recognition of their programme; but they now demanded a restoration in their own sense—revival of the commemoration of their dead, punishment of the murderers, recall of the proscribed from exile, removal of the political disqualification that lay on their children, restoration of the estates confiscated by Sulla, mdemnification at the expense of the heirs and assistants of the dictator These were certainly the logical consequences which of the coalition of  $\frac{s_{f_1}^2}{s_{f_2}^2}$  was very far from being such The democracy gave to it their name and their programme, but it was the officers who had joined the movement, and above all Pompeus, that gave to it power and completion, and these could never yield their consent to a reaction which would not only have shaken the existing state of things to its founda tions, but would have ultimately turned against themselvesmen still had a lively recollection whose blood Pomneius had shed, and how Crassus had laid the foundation of his enormous fortune. It was natural therefore, but at the same time significant of the weakness of the democracy, that the coalition of democrats revenge or even rehabilitation. The supplementary collection of all the purchase money still outstanding for con fiscated estates bought by auction, or even remitted to the purchasers by Sulla-for which the censor Lentulus provided in a special law-can hardly be regarded as an exception, for though not a few Sullans were thereby severely affected in their personal interests, yet the measure itself was essentially a confirmation of the confiscations undertaken by Sulls

Book V.

02

The work of Sulla was thus destroyed, but what the future order of things was to be was a question raised rather than decided by that destruction The coalition, Lept together solely by the common object of setting aside the work of restoration, dissolved of itself, if not in name, at any rate in reality, when that object was attained, while the question to what quarter the preponderance of power was in the first instance to fall seemed approaching an equally speedy and violent solution. The armies of Pompeius and Crissus still lay before the gares of the city The former had indeed promised to disband his soldiers after his triumph (last day of December, 4,2), but he had left his promise unperformed, in order that the revolution in the state might be completed without hindrance under the pressure which the Spanish army in front of the capital exercised over the city and the senate-a precedent which m I ke manner applied to the army of Crassus. This reason now existed no longer, but still the dissolution of the armies was postported Matters looked as if one of the two generals all ed with the democracy would seize the military dictatorship and place

CHAP. III.

oligarchs and démocrats in the same chains; and this one could only be Pompeius. From the first Crassus had played a sub-ordinate part in the coalition; he had been obliged to propose himself, and owed even his election to the consulship mainly to the proud intercession of Pompeius. Far the stronger, Pompeius was evidently master of the situation; if he availed himself of it, it seemed as if he could not but become what the instinct of the multitude even now designated him—the absolute ruler of the mightiest state in the civilised world. Already the whole mass of the servile crowded around the future monarch. Already his weaker opponents were seeking their last resource in a new coalition; Crassus, full of old and recent jealousy towards the younger rival who so thoroughly outstripped him, made approaches to the senate and attempted by unprecedented largesses to attach to himself the multitude of the capital-as if the oligarchy which Crassus himself had helped to break down, and the ever ungrateful multitude, would have been able to afford any protection whatever against the veterans of the Spanish army. For a moment it seemed as if the armies of Pompeius and Crassus would come to blows before the gates of the capital.

But the democrats averted this catastrophe by their sagacity and their pliancy. For their party too, as well as for the senate and Crassus, it was all-important that Pompeius should not seize the dictatorship; but with a truer discernment of their own weakness and of the character of their powerful opponent their leaders tried the method of conciliation. Pompeius lacked no condition for grasping at the crown except the first of alltrue kingly courage. We have already described the manwith his effort to be at once loyal republican and master of Rome, with his vacillation and indecision, with his pliableness that concealed itself under the boasting of independent resolution. This was the first great trial to which destiny subjected him; and he failed to stand it. The pretext under which Pompeius refused to dismiss the army was, that he distrusted Crassus and therefore could not take the initiative in disbanding the soldiers. The democrats induced Crassus to make gracious advances in the matter, and to present overtures of peace to his colleague before the eyes of all; in public and in private they be sought the latter that to the double merit of having vanquished the enemy and reconciled the parties he would add the third and yet greater service of preserving internal peace to his country, and banishing the fearful spectre of civil war with which they were threatened. Whatever could tell on a vain, unskilful, vacillating man-all the flattering arts of diplomacy, all the thentrical apparatus of patriotic enthusiasm-was put in motion to obtain the desired result, and which was the main point things had by the well timed compliances of Crassus assumed such a shape, that Pompeius had no alternative but either to come forward openly as tyrant of Rome or to retire So he at length yielded and consented to disband the troops The com mand in the Mithradatic war, which he doubtless hoped to obtain when be allowed himself to be chosen consul for 14th, he could not now desire, since Lucullus seemed to have practically ended that war with the campaign of "A" He deemed it beneath his dignity to accept the consular province assigned him by the senate in accordance with the Sempronian law, and Crassus in this followed his example Accordingly when Pompeius after discharging his soldiers resigned his consulship on the last day of *** he retired for the time wholly from public affairs, and declared that he wished thenceforth to live a quiet life as a simple citizen. He had put hunself into such a position that he was obliged to grasp at the crown, and, seeing that he was not willing to do this, no part was left to him but the empty one of a candidate resigning his pretensions to a

The retirement of the man, to whom as things stood the first place belonged, from the political stage produced in the first instance nearly the same position of parties which we found in the Gracchan and Marian epochs Sulla had merely strengthened the senatorial government, not created it, so, after the bulwarks erected by Sulla had fallen, the government nevertheless remained primarily with the senate, although, no doubt, the constitution with which it governed in the main the restored Gracehan constitution-was pervaded by a spirit hostile to the oligarchy The democracy had effected the reestablishment of the Gracchan constitution, but without a new Gracehus it was a body without a head, and that neither Pompenus nor Crassus could be permanently such a head, was in itself clear and had been made still clearer by the recent events So the democratic opposition, for want of a leader who could have directly seized the helm, had to content uself for the time being with hindering and annoying the government at every step Between the oligarchy, however, and the democracy there rose into new consideration the capitalist party, which in the recent crisis had made common cause with the latter, but which the ol garchs now zealously endeavoured to draw

CHAP. III.

over to their side so as to acquire in it a counterpoise to the democracy. Thus courted on both sides the moneyed lords did not neglect to turn their advantageous position to account, and to have the only one of their former privileges which they had not yet regained—the fourteen benches reserved for the equestrian order in the theatre—now  $(\frac{6.87}{6.7})$  restored to them by decree of the people. On the whole, without abruptly breaking with the democracy, they again drew closer to the government. The very relations of the senate with Crassus and his clients point in this direction; but a better understanding between the senate and the moneyed aristocracy seems to have been chiefly brought about by the fact, that in  $\frac{6.86}{6.8}$  the senate withdrew from Lucius Lucullus the ablest of the senatorial officers, at the instance of the capitalists whom he had sorely annoyed, the administration of the province of Asia so important for their purposes (p. 64). But while the factions of the capital were indulging in their wonted mutual quarrels which they were never able to bring to any proper decision, events in the East followed their fatal course, as we have already described; and it was these events that brought the dilatory course of the politics of the capital to a crisis. The war both by land and by sea had there taken a most unfavourable turn. In the beginning of  $\frac{687}{67}$  the Pontic army of the Romans was destroyed, and their Armenian army was utterly breaking up on its retreat; all their conquests were lost, the sea was exclusively in the power of the pirates, and the price of grain in Italy was thereby so raised that they were afraid of an actual famine. No doubt, as we saw, the faults of the generals, especially the utter incapacity of the admiral Marcus Antonius and the temerity of the otherwise able Lucius Lucullus, were in part the occasion of these calamities; no doubt also the democracy had by its revolutionary agitations materially contributed to the breaking up of the Armenian army. But of course the government was now held cumulatively responsible for all the mischief which itself and others had occasioned, and the indignant hungry multitude desired only an opportunity to settle accounts with the senate.

It was a decisive crisis. The oligarchy, though degraded and disarmed, was not yet overthrown, for the management of public affairs was still in the hands of the senate; but it would fall, if its opponents should appropriate to themselves that management and more especially the superintendence of military affairs; and now this was possible. If proposals for another and better management of the war by land and sea were now submitted to the comitia, the senate was obviously-looking to the temper of the burgesses-not in a position to prevent their passing, and an interference of the burgesses in these supreme questions of administration was practically the deposition of the senate and the transference of the management of the state to the leaders of opposition Once more the concatenation of events brought the decision into the hands of Pompeius For more than two years the famous general had lived as a private citizen in the capital His voice was seldom heard in the senate house or in the Forum, in the former he was unwelcome and without influence, in the latter he was afraid of the stormy proceedings of the parties But when he did show himself, it was with the full retinue of his clients high and low, and the very fact of his solemn reserve imposed on the multitude If he, who was still surrounded with the unduminished lustre of his extraordinary successes, should now offer to go to the East, he would beyond doubt be readily invested by the burresses with all the plenitude of military and political power which be might ask. For the oligarchy, which saw in the popular military dictatorship their certain ruin, and in Pompeius himself since the coalition of " their most hated foe, this was an overwhelming blow, but the democratic party also could have little comfort in the prospect. However desirable the putting an end to the government of the senate could not but be in itself, it was, if it took place in this way, far less a victor, for their party than a personal victory for their overpowerful ally the latter there might easily arise a far more dangerous opponent to the democratic party than the senate had been The danger fortunately avoided a few years before by the disbanding of the Spanish army and the retirement of Pompeius would recur in an mcreased measure, if Pompeius should now be placed at the head of the armies of the East.

On this occasion, however, Pompeius acted or at least allowed others to act in his behalf. In $27 two projects of his were introduced, one of which, besides decreing the discharge—long demanded by the democracy—of the soliters of the Assarc army who had served their term, decreed the recall of its commander in-chief Lucius Luculius and the supplying of his place by one of the consults of the current year, Gains Piso or Manius Glabrio, while the second resired and extended the plan proposed seven years before by the servate staff of cleaning the seas from the purster. A single general to be named by the senate from the consulars was to be appointed, to hold by sea exclusive command over the whole Mediterranean from the Pillars of Hercules to the coasts of Pontus and Syria, and to exercise by land, concurrently with the respective Roman governors, supreme command over the whole coasts for fifty miles inland. The office was secured to him for three years. He was surrounded by a staff, such as Rome had never seen, of five-and-twenty lieutenants of senatorial rank, all invested with praetorian insignia and praetorian powers, and of two under-treasurers with quaestorian prerogatives, all of them selected by the exclusive will of the commander-in-chief. He was allowed to raise as many as 120,000 infantry, 7000 cavalry, 500 ships of war, and for this purpose to dispose absolutely of the means of the provinces and client-states; moreover, the existing vessels of war and a considerable number of troops were at once handed over to him. The treasures of the state in the capital and in the provinces as well as those of the dependent communities were to be placed absolutely at his command, and in spite of the severe financial distress a sum of £1,400,000 (144,000,000 sesterces) was at once to be paid to him from the state-chest.

CHAP. III.

It is clear that by these projects of law, especially by that which related to the expedition against the pirates, the government of the senate was set aside. Doubtless the ordinary supreme magistrates nominated by the burgesses were of themselves the proper generals of the commonwealth, and the extraordinary magistrates needed, at least according to strict law, confirmation by the burgesses in order to act as generals; but in the appointment to particular commands no influence constitutionally belonged to the community, and it was only on the proposition of the senate, or at any rate on the proposition of a magistrate entitled in himself to exercise the office of general, that the comitia had hitherto occasionally interfered in this matter and assigned the special sphere of office. On this point, ever since there had existed a Roman free state, the practical decision pertained to the senate, and this its prerogative had in the course of time obtained full recognition. No doubt the democracy had already assailed it; but even in the most doubtful of the cases which had hitherto occurred—the transference of the African command to Gaius Marius in  $\frac{647}{107}$  (iii. 149)—it was only a magistrate constitutionally entitled to hold the office of general that was entrusted by the resolution of the burgesses with a definite expedition. But now the burgesses were to invest any private man at their pleasure not merely with the extraordinary authority of the supreme magistracy, but also with a sohere of office definitely settled by them. That the senate had to choose this man from the ranks of the consulars, was a mitigation only in form: for the selection was left to it simply because there was really no choice, and in presence of the vehemently excited multitude the senate could entrust the chief command of the seas and coasts to no other save Pompeius alone. But more dangerous still than this negation in principle of the senatonal control was its practical abolition by the institution of an office of almost unlimited military and financial powers. While the office of general was formerly restricted to a term of one year, to a definite province, and to military and financial resources strictly measured out, the new extraordinary office had from the outset a duration of three years secured to it-which of course did not preclude a farther prolongation; had the creater portion of all the provinces, and even Italy itself which was formerly free from rollitary jurisdiction, subordinated to it: had the soldiers, ships, treasures of the state placed almost without restriction at its disposal. Even the primitive funda mental principle in the state-law of the Roman republic which we have just mentioned-that the highest military and envil authority could not be conferred without the co-operation of the burgesses-was infringed in favour of the new commanderin-chief Inasmuch as the law conferred beforehand on the twenty-five adjutants whom he was to nominate practorian

98

Rome became subordinate to a newly created office, for which it was left to the future to find the fitting name, but which in reality even now involved in it the monarchy. It was a total revolution in the existing order of things, for which the foundation was laid in this project of law.

These measures of a man who had just given so striking proofs of his vacillation and weakness surprise us by their decisive energy. Nevertheless the fact that Pompeius acted on this occasion more resolutely than during his consulate is very capable of explanation. The point at issue was not that he should come forward at once as monarch, but only that he should prepare the way for the monarchy by a military exceptional measure, which, revolutionary as it was in its nature, could still be accomplished under the forms of the existing constitution, and which directly led Pompeius towards the old object of his wishes. the command against Mithradates and Tigranes. Important reasons of expediency also might be urged for the emancipation of the military power from the senate. Pompeius could not have forgotten that a plan designed on exactly similar principles for the suppression of piracy had a few years before failed through the mismanagement of the senate, and that the issue of the Spanish war had been placed in extreme jeopardy by the neglect of the armies on the part of the senate and its injudicious conduct of the finances; he could not fail to see what were the feelings with which the great majority of the aristocracy regarded him as a renegade Sullan, and what fate was in store for him, if he allowed himself to be sent as general of the government with the usual powers to the East. It was natural therefore that he should indicate a position independent of the senate as the first condition of his undertaking the command, and that the burgesses should readily agree to it. It is moreover in a high degree probable that Pompeius was on this occasion urged to more one of those about him as his substitute, who was then called legatus pro practore (Sallust, Iug. 36, 37, 38), or, if the choice fell on the quaestor, quaestor pro practore (Sallust, Iug. 103). In like manner he was entitled, if he had no quaestor, to cause the quaestorial duties to be discharged by one of his suite, who was then called legatus pro quaestore, a name which is to be met with, perhaps for the first time, on the Macedonia tetradrachms of Sura, lieutenant of the governor of Macedonia in  $\frac{66.5}{8.9}$ . But it was contrary to the nature of delegation and therefore according to the older state-law inadmissible, that the highest magistrate should, without having met with any hindrance to the discharge of his functions, immediately upon his entering on office invest one or more of his subordinates with supreme authority; and thus the legati pro praetore of the proconsul Pompeius were an innovation, and already similar in kind to those who played so great a part in the times of the empire.

- by those around him, who were, it may be presumed, it two years before ucullus and the expedition . the tribune of the people

Anlus tranmus, a tum .... lances and morals, but a dexterous negotiator, a bold orator, and a hrave soldier Little as the assurances of Pompenis, that he had no wish at all for the chief command in the war with the pirates and only longed for domestic repose, were meant in earnest, there was probably this much of truth in them, that the bold and active client, who was in confidential intercourse with Pompeius and his more immediate friends and who completely saw through the situation and the men, took the decision to a considerable extent out of the hands of his shortsighted and helpless patron

The democracy, discontented as its leaders might be in secret. could not well come publicly forward against the project of law It would, to all appearance, have been in no case able to hunder or of the law, but it would have openly broken with

to make approaches his personal policy

in the face of both parties levices left to the democrats but still to adhere to their alliance with Pompeius, hollow as it was, and to embrace the present opportunity of at least definitively overthrowing the senate and passing over from opposition into government, leaving the ulterior usue to the future and to the well known weakness of Pompeius' character Accordingly their leaders—the practor Lucius Quinctius, the same who seven years before had exerted himself for the restoration of the tri-power (p 84), and the late quaestor Gaius Carsar-

supported the Gabinian proposals

The privileged classes were furious-not merely the noblity, but also the mercantile aristocracy, which felt its exclusive rights endangered by so thorough a state-revolution and once more When the tribure recognised its true patron in the senate Gabinius after the introduction of his proposals appeared in she centte-house, the fathers of the city were almost on the point - handy without considering to the Forum and sulli to house, when just at the right time the sitting term -consul Piso, the champion of the ol garchy, who accedentally fell into the hands of the multitude, would have certainly become a victim to popular fury, had not Gabinius come up and, in order that his certain success might not be endangered by unseasonable acts of violence, liberated the consul. Meanwhile the exasperation of the multitude remained undiminished and constantly found fresh nourishment in the high prices of grain and the numerous rumours more or less absurd which were in circulation—such as that Lucius Lucullus had invested the money entrusted to him for carrying on the war at interest in Rome, or had attempted with its aid to withdraw the practor Quinctius from the cause of the people; that the senate intended to prepare for the "second Romulus," as they called Pompeius, the fate of the first, and other reports of a like character.

Amidst this state of things the day of voting arrived. The multitude stood densely packed in the Forum; all the buildings. whence the rostra could be seen, were covered even on the roofs with men. All the colleagues of Gabinius had promised their veto to the senate; but in presence of the surging masses all were silent except the single Lucius Trebellius, who had sworn to himself and the senate rather to die than yield. When the latter exercised his veto, Gabinius immediately interrupted the voting on his projects of law and proposed to the assembled people to deal with his refractory colleague, as Octavius had formerly been dealt with on the proposition of Tiberius Gracchus (iii. 87), namely, to depose him immediately from office. vote was taken and the reading out of the voting tablets began; when the first seventeen tribes, which came to be read out, had declared for the proposal and the next affirmative vote would give it the majority, Trebellius, forgetting his oath, pusillanimously withdrew his veto. In vain the tribune Otho then endeavoured to procure at least the election of two generals —the old duumviri navales (i. 412)—instead of one; in vain the aged Quintus Catulus, the most respected man in the senate, exerted his last energies to secure that the lieutenant-generals should not be nominated by the commander-in-chief, but chosen by the people. Otho could not even procure a hearing amidst the noise of the multitude; the well-calculated complaisance of Gabinius procured a hearing for Catulus, and in respectful silence the multitude listened to the old man's words; but they were nevertheless thrown away. The proposals were not merely converted into law with all the clauses unaltered, but the special supplementary requests made by Pompeius were instantaneously and completely agreed to.

&lt;sup>1</sup> According to the legend king Romulus was torn in pieces by the senators.

With high-strung hopes men saw the two generals Pompeius and Glabrio depart for their destinations. The price of grain had fallen immediately after the passing of the Gabinian laws to the ordinary rates-an evidence of the hopes attached to the grand expedition and its glorious leader. These hopes were, as we shall have afterwards to relate, not merely fulfilled, but surpassed: in three months the clearing of the seas was completed. Since the Hannibalic war the Roman government if ' and an each enemy in external action; as compared . . . . . . . . . . the good its time to git in the "interest of the equally unpatriotic and unskillful attempts of the court it so to put paltry obstacles in the way of the arrangements of Pomneius for the suppression of piracy in Narbonese Gaul only increased the exasperation of the burgesses against the oligarchy and their enthusiasm for Pompeius; it was nothing but the personal intervention of the latter that prevented the assembly " . - ---- from summarily removing the consul from his office. antinent had become in the stead of tes and Tigranes, Luculius the true. ....

had remained stationary in the west of Asia Minor and, while instigating the soldiers by various proclamations against Lucullus, had not entered on the supreme command, so that Lucullus was forced to retain it. Against Mithradates, of course, nothing was done; the Pontic cavalry plundered fearlessly and with impunity in Bithynia and Cappadocia. Pompeius had been led by the piratical war to proceed with his army to Asia Mmor; nothing seemed more natural than to invest him with the supreme command in the Pontic-Armenian war, to which he himself had long aspired. But the democratic party did not, as may be readily conceived, share the wishes of its general, and carefully avoided taking the initiative in the matter. It is very probable that it had induced Gabinius not to entrust both the war with Mithradates and that with the pirates from the outset to Pompeius, but to entrust the former to Glabrio; upon no account could it now desire to increase and perpetuate the exceptional position of the already too powerful general. Pompeius himself retained according to his custom a passive attitude; and perhaps he would in reality have returned home after fulfilling the commission which he had received, but for the occurrence of an incident unexpected by all parties.

One Gaius Manilius, an utterly worthless and insignificant man, had when tribune of the people by his unskilful projects of legislation lost favour both with the aristocracy and with the democracy. In the hope of sheltering himself under the wing of the powerful general, if he should procure for the latter what every one knew that he eagerly desired but had not the boldness to ask, Manilius proposed to the burgesses to recall the governors Glabrio from Bithynia and Pontus and Marcius Rex from Cilicia, and to entrust their offices as well as the conduct of the war in the East, apparently without any fixed limit as to time and at any rate with the freest authority to conclude peace and alliance, to the proconsul of the seas and coasts in addition to his previous office (beginning of  $\frac{GR}{GG}$ ). This occurrence very clearly showed how disorganised was the machinery of the Roman constitution, when the power of legislation was placed as respected the initiative in the hands of any demagogue however insignificant, and as respected the final determination in the hands of the incapable multitude, while it at the same time was extended to the most important questions of administration. The Manilian proposal was acceptable to none of the political parties; yet it scarcely anywhere encountered serious resistance. The democratic leaders, for the same reasons which had forced them to acquiesce in the Gabinian law, could not venture earnestly to oppose the Manilian; they kept their displeasure and their fears to themselves and spoke in public for the general of the democracy. The moderate Optimates declared themselves for the Manilian proposal, because after the Gabinian law resistance in any case was vain, and far-seeing men already perceived that the true policy for the senate was to make approaches as far as possible to Pompeius and to draw him over to their side on occasion of the breach which might be foreseen between him and the democrats. The trimmers blessed the day when they too seemed to have an opinion and could come forward decidedly without losing favour with either of the parties-it is significant that Marcus Cicero first appeared as an orator on the political platform in defence of the Manilian proposal. The strict Optimates alone, with Quintus Catulus at their head, showed at least their colours and spoke against the proposition. Of course it was converted into law by a majority bordering on unanimity. Pompeius thus obtained, in addition to his earlier extensive powers, the administration of the most important provinces of Asia Minor—so that there scarcely remained a spot of land within the wide Roman domains that had not obeyed him—and the conduct of a war as to which, like the expedition of Alexander, men could tell where and when it began, but not where and when it might end. Never since Rome stood had such power been united in the hands of a single man

The Gabinio-Manilian proposals terminated the struggle between the senate and the popular party, which the Sempinan laws had begun sixty-seven years before. As the Sempinonian laws first constituted the revolutionary party into a political opposition, the Gabinio-Manilian first converted it from the opposition into the government; and as it had been a great moment when the first breach in the existing constitution was made by disregarding the veto of Octavius, it was a moment no less full of significance when the last bulwark of the senatorial rule fell with the withdrawal of Trebellius. This was felt on both sides and even the indolent souls of the senators were convulsively roused by this death-struggle; but yet the way as to the constitution terminated in a very different and fur natinguers and demugonate a set type. On the other hand, while the Optimates had begun the struggle with a measured resistance and with a delence which carnestly maintained even the forlorn posts, they ended with taking the initiative in cli hew old men, who had seen the first storius of obtain and heard the words of the Gracch, computed that time with the present, they found that everything had in the interval changed —countrymen and citizens, state-law and military d copine, life and manners, and well might those punfully sail's, who compared the ideals of the Gracchan period with their relusation. Such reflections however belonged to the past. For the present and perhaps also for the future the lab of the sail-cracy was an accomplished fact. The oligard's resembled an whose scattered bands in ght series to have thereselves the old study of the series of the series of the old study of beginning—the stringle between the two parets hitherto leagued for the overti row of the anistocratic centrius on, the civil-democratic opposition and the military power its 'y aspireg to greater ascendancy. The exceptional position of Pompeius even under the Gabinian, and much more under the Manilian. law was incompatible with a republican organisation. He had been, as even then his opponents urged with good reason, appointed by the Gabinian law not as admiral, but as regent of the empire; not unjustly was he designated by a Greek familiar with Eastern affairs "kings of kings." If he should hereafter, on returning from the East once more victorious and with increased glory, with well-filled chests, and with troops ready for battle and devoted to his cause, stretch forth his hand to seize the crown—who would then arrest his arm? Was the consular Quintus Catulus, forsooth, to summon forth the senators against the first general of his time and his experienced legions? or was the designated aedile Gaius Caesar to call forth the civic multitude, whose eyes he had just feasted on his three hundred and twenty pairs of gladiators with their silver equipments? Soon, exclaimed Catulus, it would be necessary once more to flee to the rocks of the Capitol, in order to save liberty. It was not the fault of the prophet, that the storm came not as he expected from the East, but that on the contrary fate, fulfilling his words more literally than he himself anticipated, brought on the destroying tempest a few years later from Gaul.

A youth in every sense

CHAPTER IV

POMPEIUS AND THE EAST

We have already seen how wretched was the state of the affairs of Rome by land and sea in the East, when at the commencement of $57 Pompeius, with an almost absolute plenitude of power, undertook the conduct of the war against the pirates. He began by dividing the immense field committed to him into thirteen districts and assigning to each of these districts a lieutenant. for the purpose of equipping ships and men there, of searching the coasts, and of capturing piratical vessels or chasing them into the meshes of a colleague. He himself went with the best this e tion a large de la conand Sardinian waters, with a view especially to re-establish the much of prain from there arrapinese to Yeals. The l'accesants attempted from Rome to prevent the levies which Marcus Pomponius the legate of Pompeius instituted by virtue of the Gabinian law in the province of Narbo-an imprudent proceeding, to check which, and at the same time to keep the just indignation of the multitude against the consul within legabounds, Pompeius temporarily reappeared in Rome (p. 102) When at the end of forty days the navigation had been everywhere set free in the western basin of the Mediterranean Pompeius proceeded with sixty of his best vestels to the eastern the open sea; and even the strong Lycian fortresses of Anticragus and Gragus surrendered without offering serious resistance. The well-calculated moderation of Pompeius helped more than fear to open the gates of these scarcely accessible marine strongholds. His predecessors had ordered every captured freeboote to be nailed to the cross; without heisitation he gave quarter to all, and treated in particular the common rowers found in the captured piratical vessels with unusual indulgence. The bold Cilician sea-kings alone ventured on an attempt to maintain at least their own waters by arms against the Romans; after having placed their children and wives and their rich treasures for security in the mountain-fortresses of the Taurus, they awaited the Roman fleet at the western frontier of Cilicia, in the offing of Coracesium. But the ships of Pompeius, well manned and well provided with all implements of war, achieved a complete victory. Without farther hindrance he landed and began to storm and break up the mountain-castles of the corsairs, while he continued to offer to themselves freedom and life as the price of submission. Soon the great multitude desisted from the continuance of a hopeless war in their strongholds and mountains, and consented to submit. Forty-nine days after Pompeius had appeared in the eastern seas, Cilicia was subdued and the war at an end.

The rapid suppression of piracy was a great relief, but not a grand achievement; the corsairs could as little cope with the resources of the Roman state which had been called forth in lavish measure as the combined gangs of thieves in a great city can cope with a well-organised police. It was a naïve proceeding to celebrate such a razzia as a victory. But when compared with the prolonged continuance and the vast and daily increasing extent of the evil, it was natural that the surprisingly rapid subjugation of the dreaded pirates should make a most powerful impression on the public; and the more so, that this was the first trial of rule centralised in a single hand, and the parties were eagerly waiting to see whether that hand would understand the art of ruling better than the collegiate body had done. Nearly 400 ships and boats, including 90 war vessels properly so called, were either taken by Pompeius or surrendered to him; in all about 1300 piratical vessels are said to have been destroyed; besides which the richly filled arsenals and magazines of the buccaneers were burnt. Of the pirates about 10,000 perished; upwards of 20,000 fell into the hands of the victor alive; while Publius Clodius the admiral of the Roman army stationed in Cilicia, and a multitude of other individuals carried off by the pirates, some of them long believed at home to be dead, obtained once more their freedom through Pompeius. In the summer of 687, three months after the beginning of the compaign commerce resumed its wonted course, and instead of the former famine abundance prevailed in Italy.

A disagreeable interlude in the island of Crete, however, disturbed in some measure this pleasing success of the Roman arms. There Quintus Metellus was stationed in the second year of his command, and was employed in finishing the subjugation—already substantially effected—of the island (p. 71) when Pompeius appeared in the eastern waters. A collision was natural, for according to the Gabinian law the command of Pompeius extended concurrently with that of Metellus over the whole island, which stretched to a great length but was nowhere more than eighty miles broad, but Pompeius was considerate enough not to assign it to any of his lieutenants. The still resisting Cretan communities however, who had seen this resisting Cretan taken to task by Metellus with the rost cruel severity and had learned on the other hand the gentle

Pamphylia, where he was at the moment, from their envoys, and sent along with them his legate Lucius Octavius to announce to Metellus the conclusion of the conventions and to take over the towns This proceeding was, no doubt, not like that of a colleague, but formal right was wholl, on the side of Pompens concague, our terminaright was whonly on the site of tempera-and Metellus was most evidently in the wrong when, utterly ignoring the convention of the cities with Fompeus, he con timued to treat them as hostile. In vain Octavius protested, in vain, as he had himself come without troops, he summoned from Achaia Lucius Sisenna, the lieutenant of Pompeius stationed there, Metellus, not troubling himself about either Octavitt er Sisenna, besieged Eleutherna and took Lappa by storm where Octavius in person was taken prisoner and ignominiously dis missed, while the Cretans who were taken with him were consigned to the executioner Accordingly formal conflicts took place between the troops of Sisenna, at whose head Octavica placed himself after that leader's death, and those of Metellas, even when the former had been commanded to return to Achaia Octavius continued the war in concert with the Cretan Aristkin and Hierapytna, where both made a stand, was only subdued by Metellus after the most obstinate resistance

In reality the realous Optimate Metellus had thus begun formal civil war at his own hand against the processis mo of the democracy. It shows the indeembable organisation in the Roman state, that these incidents led to nothing further than a bitter correspondence between the two generals who

a couple of years afterwards were sitting once more peacefully and even "amicably" side by side in the senate.

Pompeius during these events remained in Cilicia; preparing for the next year, as it seemed, a compaign against the Cretans or rather against Metellus, in reality waiting for the signal which should call him to interfere in the utterly confused affairs of the continent of Asia Minor. The portion of the Lucullan army that was still left after the losses which it had suffered and the departure of the Fimbrian legions remained inactive on the upper Halys in the country of the Trocmi bordering on the Pontic territory. Lucullus still held provisionally the chief command, as his nominated successor Glabrio continued to linger in the west of Asia Minor. The three legions commanded by Quintus Mareius Rex lay equally inactive in Cilicia. Pontie territory was again wholly in the power of king Mithradates, who made the individuals and communities that had joined the Romans, such as the town of Eupatoria, pay for their revolt with cruel severity. The kings of the East did not proceed to any serious offensive movement against the Romans, either because it formed no part of their plan, or-as was asserted-because the landing of Pompeius in Cilicia induced Mithradates and Tigranes to desist from advancing farther. The Manilian law realised the secretly cherished hopes of Pompeius more rapidly than he probably himself anticipated; Glabrio and Rex were recalled and the governorships of Pontus-Bithynia and Cilieia with the troops stationed there, as well as the management of the Pontic-Armenian war along with authority to make war, peace, and alliance with the dynasts of the East at his own discretion, were transferred to Pompeius. Amidst the prospect of honours and spoils so ample Pompeius was glad to forego the chastising of an ill-humoured Optimate who enviously guarded his seanty laurels; he abandoned the expedition against Crete and the farther pursuit of the corsairs, and destined his fleet also to support the attack which he projected on the kings of Pontus and Armenia. Yet amidst this land-war he by no means wholly lost sight of piracy which was perpetually raising its head afresh. Before he left Asia (691/63) he caused the necessary ships to be fitted out there against the corsairs; on his proposal in the following year a similar measure was resolved on for Italy, and the sum needed for the purpose was granted by the senate. They continued to protect the coasts with guards of eavalry and small squadrons, and though, as the expeditions to be mentioned afterwards against Cyprus in ** and Egypt in ** show, piracy was not thoroughly mastered, it yet after the expedition of Pompeius amidst all the vicissitudes and political crises of Rome could never again x raise its head and so totally dislodge the Romans from the sea as it had done under the government of the mouldering oligarchy.

The few months which still remained before the commencement of the campaign in Asia Minor, were employed by the new commander in-chief with strenuous activity in diplomatic and military preparations Envoys were sent to Mithradates, rather to reconnoitre than to attempt a serious mediation There was a hope at the Pontic court that Phraates king of the Parthians would be induced by the recent considerable successes which the allies had achieved over Rome to enter into the Pontic-Armenian alliance To counteract this, Roman envoys proceeded to the court of Ctesiphon; and the internal troubles, which distracted the Armenian ruling house, came to their aid. A son of the great king Tigranes, bearing the same name, had rebelled against his father, either because he was unwilling to wait for the death of the old man, or because his father sauspicton, which had already cost several of his brothers their lives, led him to discern his only chance of safety in open insurrection Vanguished by his father, he had taken refuge with a number of Armenians of rank at the court of the Arsacid, and intrigued against his father there It was partly due to his exertions, that Phraates preferred to take the reward which was offered to him " er ---- the secured possession of Meso-

of the Euphrates (p o<sub>51</sub>).

concert with the Romans against Armenia But u , Tigranes occasioned still greater damage than that which arose out of his promoting the alliance between the Romans and the Parthians, for his insurrection produced a vizance between the kings Tigranes and Mithradates themselves. The great king cherished in secret the suspicion that Mithradates might have had a hand in the insurrection of his grandsom—Gropaira the mother of the younger Tigranes was the daughter of Mithradates—and, though no open rupture took place, the good understanding between the two monarchs was disturbed at the very moment when it was most urgently needed.

At the same time Portpetrus prosecuted his warlike preparations with energy. The Assatic allied and client overnumited were warned to furnit the stipulated contingents. Public notices summoned the discharged veterans of the legions of Fimbria to return to the standards as volunteers, and by great promises and the name of Pompeius a considerable portion of them were induced in reality to obey the call. The whole force united under the orders of Pompeius may have amounted, exclusive of the auxiliaries, to between 40,000 and 50,000 men.1

In the spring of 688 Pompeius proceeded to Galatia, to take the chief command of the troops of Lucullus and to advance with them into the Pontic territory, whither the Cilician legions were directed to follow. At Danala, a place belonging to the Trocmi, the two generals met; but the reconciliation, which mutual friends had hoped to effect, was not accomplished. The preliminary courtesies soon passed into bitter discussions, and these into violent altercation: they parted in worse mood than they had met. As Lucullus continued to make presents and to distribute lands just as if he were still in office, Pompeius declared all the acts performed by his predecessor subsequent to his own arrival null and void. Formally he was in the right; befitting tact in the treatment of a meritorious and more than sufficiently mortified opponent was not to be looked for from him.

So soon as the season allowed, the Roman troops crossed the frontier of Pontus. There they were opposed by Mithradates with 30,000 infantry and 3000 cavalry. Left in the lurch by his ally and attacked by Rome with reinforced power and energy, he made an attempt to procure peace; but he would not listen to the unconditional submission which Pompeius demandedwhat worse issue could the most unsuccessful campaign bring? That he might not expose his army, mostly archers and horsemen, to the formidable shock of the Roman infantry of the line, he slowly retired before the enemy, and compelled the Romans to follow him in his various cross-marches; making a stand, wherever there was opportunity, with his superior cavalry against that of the enemy, and occasioning no small hardship to the Romans by impeding their supplies. At last Pompeius in his impatience desisted from following the Pontic army, and, letting the king alone, proceeded to subdue the land; he marched to the upper Euphrates, crossed it, and entered the eastern provinces of the Pontic empire. But Mithradates followed along the left bank of the Euphrates, and when he had arrived in the Anaitic or Acilisenian province, he intercepted the route of the Romans at the castle of Dasteira, which was strong and well provided with water, and from which with his light troops he commanded the plain Pompeius, still wanting the Cilcian legions and not strong enough to maintain himself in this position without them, had to retire over the Euphrates and to seek protection from the cavalry and archers of the king in the wooded ground of Pontic Armenia extensively intersected by rocky ravines and deep valleys It was not till the troops from Cilicia arrived and rendered it possible to resume the offensive with a superiority of force, that Pompeius again advanced, - eted the camp of the king with a chain of posts of almost .. . - comally blockaded there, " " untry far and wide

&lt;sup>1</sup> Pompeius distributed among his soldiers and officers as presents 384,000,000 sesterces (=16,000 talents, App. Mithr. 116); as the officers received 100,000,000 (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 2, 16) and each of the common soldiers 6,000 sesterces (Plin., App.), the army still numbered at its triumph about 40,000 men.

. the draught animals The distress in www. even had to be killed; at length after remaining for forty five days the king caused his sick and wounded, whom he could not save and was unwilling to leave in the hands of the enemy, to be put to death by his own troops, and departed during the night with the utmost secreey towards the east. Cautiously Pompeius followed through the unknown land the msrch was now approaching the boundary which separated the dominions of Mithradates and Tigranes When the Roman general percerved that Mithradates intended not to bring the contest to a decision within his own territory, but to draw the enemy away after him into the far distant regions of the East, he determined not to permit this

The two armies lay close to each other. During the rest at noon the Roman army set out without the enemy observing the movement, made a circuit, and occupied the heights which Liy in front and commanded a defile to be passed by the every on the southern bank of the river Lyeus (Jesch ! firnak) not far from the modern Enderes, at the point where Acceptl's was afterwards built. The following morning the Pontic troops broke up in their usual manner, and, supposing that the energy was as hitherto behind them, after accomplishing the day's march they pitched their camp in the very ralley where recircling heights the Romans had occupied Suddenly in the silence of the night there sounded all around them the directed battle-cry of the legions, and musiles from all sides prured on the Asiatic host, in which soldiers and comp-f fewers, charges horses, and camels justled each other, and amble the direct throng, notwithstanding the darkness, not a muscle faced to war; he might deem himself fortunate, if he succeeded in effecting his escape along the eastern and northern shores of the Black. Sea, in perhaps disloding his son Machares—who had revolted and entered into connection with the Romans (p. 57)—once more from the Bosporan kingdom, and in finding on the Macotis a fresh soil for fresh projects. So he turned northward. When the king in his flight had crossed the Phasis, the ancent boundary of Asia Minor, Pompeius for the time discontinued his pursuit, but instead of returning to the region of the sources of the Euphrates, he turned aside into the region of the Araxis to settle matters with Tirgianes

Almost without meeting resistance he arrived in the region of Artaxata (not far from Ernan) and pitched his camp thirteen miles from the city There he was met by the son of the great king, who hoped after the fall of his father to receive the Armenian diadem from the hand of the Romans, and therefore had endeavoured in every way to prevent the conclusion of the treaty between his father and the Romans. The great king was only the more resolved to purchase peace at any price. On horseback and without his purple robe, but adorned with the royal diadem and the royal turban, he appeared at the gate of the Roman camp and desired to be conducted to the preserve of the Roman general After having given up at the b dding of the lictors, as the regulations of the Roman camp required, his horse and his sword, he threw hunself in barbarian fashion at the feet of the proconsul, and in token of unconditional surrender placed the diadem and tiara in his hands highly delighted at a victory which cost nothing, raised the humbled king of kings, invested him again with the int gan of his dignity, and dictated the peace. Besides a payment of £1,400,000 (6000 talents) to the war-chest and a present to the soldiers, out of which each of them received 50 denami ((: 21), the king ceded all the conquests which he had made, rot merely his Phoenician, Syrian, Cilician, and Cappal scan proses sions, but also Sophene and Corduene on the right bank of the Euphrates, he was again restricted to Armenia preper, and his position of great king was, of course, at an end In a single campaign Pompeius had totally subdued the two mighty kines of Pontus and Armenia. At the beginning of $2 there was not a Roman soldier beyond the bounds of the old Reman pomes. sions; at its close king Mithradates was wandering as an ex le and without an army in the ravious of the Cancaurs, and keep Tigranes sat on the Armensan threne no kerrer as king of kings, national movements; there the arms of Cyrus and of Alexarder had formerly found their limit; now the brave garrison of the partition wall set themselves to defend it also against the Romans

Alarmed by the information that the Roman commander inchief intended next spring to cross the mountains and to pursue the Pontic king beyond the Caucasus-for Mithradates, they heard, was passing the winter in Dioscurias (Iskuria between Suchum Kale and Anakha) on the Black Sea-the Albanians under their prince Oroizes first crossed the Kur in the middle of the winter of sea-ex and threw themselves on the army, which was divided for the sake of its supplies into three larger corps under Quintus Metellus Celer, Lucius Flaccus, and Pompeius in person But Celer, on whom the chief attack fell, made a brave stand, and Pompenes, after having delivered himself from the division sent to attack him, pursued the barbarians beaten at all points as far as the Kur Artoces the king of the Iberians kept quiet and promised peace and friend-ship, but Pompeius, informed that he was secretly arming to as to fall upon the Romans on their march in the passes of the Caucasus, advanced in the spring of "a", before resuming the pursuit of Mithradates, to the two fortresses just two miles distant from each other, Harmozica (Horum Ziche or Arnazi) and Seusamora (Tsumar) which a little above the modern Ting command the two valleys of the river Kur and its tributary the Aragua, and with these the only passes feading from Armenia

retreated fortresses

and followed the inclusing to the order of a confirmed which he hoped to induce them to immediate substitute and Arthoes retired further and further into the internet, and, when at length he halted on the river Pelorus, he did so not to surrender but to fight. The Iberian archers however withing not for a moment the onset of the Roman legent, and, when Artoces saw the Pelorus also crossed by the Roman, he submitted at length to the conditions which the autor provid, and sent his children as hostages.

Pompeus row, agreeably to the plan which he had formerly projected, marched through the Sarapans pute from the region of the Kur to that of the Phans and thence down that rice to the Black Sea, where the fleet under Send at altea he was a the bum on the Colchan coast. But it was for an uncertain known.

that the force of the Albanians under the leadership of Coses, brother of the king Oroizes, was drawn up against the Romans, they are said to have amounted, including the contingent which had arrived from the inhabitants of the Transcaucasian steppes, to 60,000 infantry and 12,000 cavalry. Yet they would hardly have risked the battle, unless they had supposed that they had merely to fight with the Roman cavalry, but the cavalry had only been placed in front, and on its retiring the masses of Roman infantry showed themselves from their concealment behind After a short conflict the army of the harbarians was driven into the woods, which Pompeius gave orders to miest and set on fire The Albanians thereupon consented to make peace, and, following the example of the more powerful peoples all the tribes settled between the Aur and the Caspian concluded a treaty with the Roman general The Albanians, Iberians, and generally the peoples settled to the south along, and at the foot of, the Caucasus, thus entered at least for the moment mto relation of dependence on Rome When, on the other hand, the peoples between the Phasis and the Macotis—Colchuns, Soam, Hemochi, Jazyges, Achaeans, even the remote Battamae-were inscribed in the long list of the nations subdued by Pompeius, the notion of subjugation was evidently employed in a manner very far from exact. The Caucasus once more a - the hotem of the world the Romen s limit there destiny. As formerly his ancestor, the founder is the Postes state, had first entered his future kingdom as a figures from the executioners of Antigonus and attended only by sie borsemen, so had Mithradstes now been compelled once more to cross the frontier of his kingdom and to turn his back on his own and his fathers conquests. But to no one had the bitter of fate turned up the highest gams and the greatest losies more frequently and more capriciously than to the old saltan of Sinope, and the fortunes of men in the East changed raps by and incalculably. Well might Mithradates now in the evening of his life accept each new xeconcide with the throught that it too was only in its turn paving the way for a freely remistion and that the only thing constaint was the perfetual channer of fortune. Insaruch as the Roman rule wat all botters little intolerable to the Orientals, and Mithrade'er hands was in good and in evil a true prince of the East it must well happen that anight the lainty of the rule exercised by the Reman smite.

over the provinces, and amidst the dissensions of the political parties in Rome fermenting and ripening into civil war, Mithradates might, if he was fortunate enough to bide his time, re-establish his dominion for the third time. For this very reason-because he hoped and planned while still there was life in him—he remained dangerous to the Romans so long as he lived, as an aged refugee no less than when he had marched forth with his hundred thousands to wrest Hellas and Macedonia from the Romans. The restless old man made his way in the year 689 from Dioscurias amidst unspeakable hardships partly by land, partly by sea, to the kingdom of Panticapaeum, where by his reputation and his numerous retainers he drove his renegade son Machares from the throne and compelled him to put himself to death. From this point he attempted once more to negotiate with the Romans; he besought that his paternal kingdom might be restored to him, and declared himself ready to recognise the supremacy of Rome and to pay tribute as a vassal. But Pompeius refused to grant the king a position in which he would have begun the old game afresh, and insisted on his personal submission.

Mithradates, however, had no thought of giving himself into the hands of the enemy, but was projecting new and still more extravagant plans. Straining all the resources with which the treasures that he had saved and the remnant of his states supplied him, he equipped a new army of 36,000 men consisting partly of slaves which he armed and exercised after the Roman fashion, and a war-fleet; according to rumour he designed to march westward through Thrace, Macedonia, and Pannonia, to carry along with him the Scythians in the Sarmatian steppes and the Celts on the Danube as allies, and with this avalanche of peoples to throw himself on Italy. This has been deemed a grand idea, and the plan of war of the Pontic king has been compared with the military march of Hannibal; but the same project, which is a stroke of genius in a man of genius, becomes an absurdity in one who is wrong-headed. This intended invasion of Italy by the Orientals was simply ridiculous, and the mere offspring of the impotent imagination of despair. Through the prudent coolness of their leader the Romans were prevented from Quixotically pursuing their Quixotic antagonist and warding off in the distant Crimea an attack, which, if it were not nipped of itself in the bud, would still be soon enough met at the foot of the Alps.

In fact, while Pompeius, without troubling himself further conflict of the East against the West; and the feeling remained with the vanquished as with the victors, that his death was not so much the end as the beginning.

Meanwhile Pompeius, after his warfare in "", with the to the first of the state of the first of the state of talle at the Steel supply (1997) castle wells were rendered unserviceable by rolling blocks of rock into them. Thence he set out in the summer of *** for Syria, to regulate its affairs,

It is difficult to present a clear view of the state of disorganisation which then prevailed in the Syrian provinces. It is true that in consequence of the attacks of Lucullus the Armenian governor Magadates had evacuated these provinces in 676 (p. 61), and that the Ptolemies, gladly as they would hav renewed the attempts of their predecessors to attach the Syrian coast to their kingdom, were yet almid to provoke the Remar government by the occupation of Syna; the more so, as that and had been several times

! . .... : reognise them as the legite mate heirs of the extinct house of the Lagidae. But, though the preater powers all at the moment refrained from interference in the affairs of Syria, the land suffered far more than it would have suffered amidst a great war, through the endless and aimkas feuds of the princes, knights, and cities.

The actual masters in the Seleucid kingdom were at this time the Bedouins, the Jews, and the Nabataeans. The me hospitable sandy steppe destitute of springs and trees, which, stretching from the Ambian peninsula up to and beyond the Euphrates, reaches towards the west as far as the Syman mountain-chain and its narrow best of coast, towards the rast as far as the rich low lands of the Tigris and lower Puphratesthis Asiatic Sahara-was the primitive home of the some of Ishmael; from the commencement of tradition we first the "Hedouin," the "son of the desert," putching his terts there and pasturing his camels, or mounting his swift here in parent now of the foe of his tribe, now of the travelling merchint. Favoured formerly by king Tigranes who made use of them I r his plans half commercial fialf political (p. 43), and subsequently by the total absence of any reaster in the byttan land, these children of the desert spread thereselves over northern Synd. Well-nigh the leading part in a political point of view was enarted by those tribes which had appropriated the first rudiments of a settled existence from the vicinity of the civilised Syrians. The most noted of these emirs were Abgarus, chief of the Arab tribe of the Mardani, whom Tigranes had settled about Edessa and Carrhae in upper Mesopotamia (p. 42); then to the west of the Euphrates Sampsiceramus, emir of the Arabs of Hemesa (Hems) between Damascus and Antioch, and master of the strong fortress Arethusa; Azizus the head of another horde roaming in the same region; Alchaudonius, the prince of the Rhambaeans, who had already put himself into communication with Lucullus; and several others.

Alongside of these Bedouin princes there had everywhere appeared bold cavaliers, who equalled or excelled the children of the desert in the noble trade of waylaying. Such was Ptolemaeus son of Mennaeus, perhaps the most powerful among these Syrian robber-chiefs and one of the richest men of this period, who ruled over the territory of the Ityraeans—the modern Druses—in the valleys of the Libanus as well as on the coast and over the plain of Massyas to the northward with the cities of Heliopolis (Baalbec) and Chalcis, and maintained 8000 horsemen at his own expense; such were Dionysius and Cinyras, the masters of the maritime cities Tripolis (Tarablus) and Byblus (between Tarablus and Beirout); such was the Jew Silas in Lysias, a fortress not far from Apamea on the Orontes.

In the south of Syria, on the other hand, the race of the Jews seemed as though it would about this time consolidate itself into a political power. Through the devout and bold defence of the primitive Jewish national worship, which was imperilled by the levelling Hellenism of the Syrian kings, the family of the Hasmonaeans or the Makkabi had not only attained to their hereditary principality and gradually to kingly honours (iii. 57); but these princely high priests had also spread their conquests to the north, south, and east. When the brave Jannaeus Alexander died ( $\frac{67}{79}$ ), the Jewish kingdom stretched towards the south over the whole Philistian territory as far as the Egyptian frontier, towards the south-east as far as the Nabataean kingdom of Petra, from which Jannaeus had wrested considerable tracts on the right bank of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, towards the north over Samaria and Decapolis up to the lake of Gennesareth; here he was already making arrangements to occupy Ptolemais (Acco) and victoriously to repel the aggressions of the Ityraeans. The coast obeyed the Jews from Mount Carmel as far as Rhinocorura, including the important Gaza-Ascalon alone was still free; so that the territory of the Jews, once almost cut off from the sea, could now be enumerated among the asylums of piracy.

the power of that remarkable conquering sacerdotal state been arrested by internal divisions.

The spirit of religious independence, and the national patriotism-the energetic union of which had called the Maccabee state into life-very soon became dissociated and even antagonistic. The Jewish orthodoxy gaining fresh strength in the times of the Maccabees, or Phansaism as it was called, proposed as its practical aim a community of Jews composed of the orthodox in all lands essentially irrespective of the secular government-a community which found its visible points of union in the tribute to the temple at Jerusalem obligatory en every conscientious Jew and in the schools of religion and spiritual courts, and its canonical superintendence in the great temple consistory at Jerusalem, which was reconstituted in the first period of the Maccabees and may be compared as respects its sphere of jurisdiction to the Roman pontifical college. Against this orthodoxy, which was becoming more and more ossified into theological formalism and a painful ceremonial service, was arrayed the opposition of the so-called Sadducres -partly dogmatic, in so far as these innovators acknowledged only the sacred books themselves and conceded authority merely, not canonicity, to the "bequests of the scriber," that is, canonical tradition; partly political, in so far as instead of a fatalistic waiting for the strong arm of the Lord of Zelaoth they taught that the salvation of the nation was to be expected from the weapons of this world, and above all from the internal and external strengthening of the kingdom of David as re-estable lished in the glorious times of the Marcabers. The parties as of orthodoxy found their support in the presthool and the multitude, and fought against the noxious herries with all the unscrupulous implicability with which the pious are eller

I Thus the Sadducese rejected the doctrons of atths and the reservoirs of the deal. Most of the traditional quantities of disperse between Practices of these theorems that the second of the properties of the properties of the second of the properties of the second of

found to contend for the possession of earthly goods. The innovators on the other hand relied for support on intelligence brought into contact with the influences of Hellenism, on the army, in which numerous Pisidian and Cilician mercenaries served, and on the abler kings, who here strove with the ecclesiastical power much as a thousand years later the Hohenstaufen strove with the Papacy. Jannaeus had kept down the priesthood with a strong hand; under his two sons there arose  $\begin{pmatrix} 6.8.5 \\ 6.9 \end{pmatrix}$  et seq.) a civil and fraternal war, since the Pharisees opposed the vigorous Aristobulus and attempted to obtain their objects under the nominal rule of his brother, the good-natured and indolent Hyrcanus. This dissension not merely put a stop to the Jewish conquests, but gave also foreign nations opportunity to interfere and to obtain a commanding position in southern Syria.

This was the case first of all with the Nabataeans. remarkable nation has often been confounded with its eastern neighbours, the wandering Arabs, but it is more closely related to the Aramaean branch than to the proper children of Ishmael. This Aramaean or, according to the designation of the Occidentals, Syrian stock must have in very early times sent forth from its most ancient settlements about Babylon a colony. probably for the sake of trade, to the northern end of the Arabian gulf; these were the Nabataeans on the Sinaitic peninsula, between the gulf of Suez and Aila, and in the region of Petra (Wadi Mousa). In their ports the wares of the Mediterranean were exchanged for those of India; the great southern caravanroute, which ran from Gaza to the mouth of the Euphrates and the Persian gulf, passed through the capital of the Nabataeans-Petra-whose still magnificent rock-palaces and rock-tombs furnish clearer evidence of the Nabataean civilisation than does an almost extinct tradition. The party of the Pharisees, to whom after the manner of priests the victory of their faction seemed not too dearly bought at the price of the independence and integrity of their country, solicited Aretas the king of the Nabataeans for aid against Aristobulus, in return for which they promised to give back to him all the conquests wrested from him by Jannaeus. Thereupon Aretas had advanced with, it was said, 50,000 men into Judaea and, reinforced by the adherents of the Pharisees, he kept king Aristobulus besieged in his capital.

Amidst the system of violence and feud which thus prevailed from one end of Syria to another, the larger cities were of course.

the principal sufferers; such as Antioch, Seleucia, Damascus, whose citizens found themselves paralysed in their husbandry as well as in their maritime and carayan trade. The citizens of Byblus and Berytus (Bewout) were unable to protect their fields and their ships from the Ityrneans, who issuing from their moontain and maritime strongholds rendered land and sea equally insecure. Those of Damascus sought to ward off the attacks of the Ityraeans and Ptolemacus by handing themselves over to the more remote kings of the Nabataeans or of the Jews. In Antioch Sampsiceramus and Azizus mingled in the internal feuds of the citizens, and the Hellenic great city had well nigh become even now the seat of an Arab emir The state of things reminds us of the kingless times of the German middle ares, when Nuremberg and Augsburg found their protection not in the sovereign jurisdiction of the ling, but in their own walls alone: impatiently the merchant-citizens of Syris awaited the strong arm, which should restore to them peace and security of intercourse

There was no want, however, of a legitimate king of Syna; there were even two or three of them. A prince Antisches from the house of the Sefeucids had been appointed by Lucullus re ruler of the most northern province in Syria, Commagene 1 4. 10 - e whose claims on the Syrian throne 's lat for the senate and from Lucullut . . . . . . . . . . the 5 . 121 11. to ... . . : meh after the retreat of the Armen -- and there accumulated as king A third School -funded him there at a prince · I Jelighte inval. ing in opposition almost sixt time. or two of the neighbouring Arab emirs had interesting in the family strife which now seemed inseparable from the rule of the Seleucids Was there any wonder that Irginally became ridicultus and loathsome to its subjects, and that the so-called rightful kings were of even somewhat less imperiouse in the land than the petty princes and robber-chiefs?

To create order smalt this chaos did not require either brilliance of conception or a raighty display of a ree, but it required a clear might into the interests of Rome and of her subjects, and a igour and consistency in establishing and consistency in establishing and continuing the institutions which were seen to be increaser. The policy of the senate in support of legitency half it would digrarded itself; the peneral when the oppositor half knopply into power was not to be guided by dynamic ransferations, but had only to see that the Syrian kingdom should not be withdrawn from the clientship of Rome in future either by the quarrels of pretenders or by the covetousness of neighbours. But to secure this end there was only one course; that the Roman community should send a satrap to grasp with a vigorous hand the reins of government, which had long since practically slipped from the hands of the kings of the ruling house more through their own fault than through outward misfortunes. This course Pompeius took. Antiochus the Asiatic, on requesting to be acknowledged as the hereditary ruler of Syria, received the answer that Pompeius would not give back the sovereignty to a king who knew neither how to maintain nor how to govern his kingdom, even at the request of his subjects, much less against their distinctly expressed wishes. With this letter of the Roman proconsul the house of Seleucus was ejected from the throne which it had occupied for two hundred and fifty years. Antiochus soon after lost his life through the artifice of the emir Sampsiceramus, as whose client he played the ruler in Antioch; thenceforth there is no further mention of these mock-kings and their pretensions.

But, to establish the new Roman government and introduce any tolerable order into the confusion of affairs, it was further necessary to advance into Syria with a military force and to terrify or subdue all the disturbers of the peace, who had sprung up during the many years of anarchy, by means of the Roman legions. Already during the campaigns in the kingdom of Pontus and on the Caucasus Pompeius had turned his attention to the affairs of Syria and directed detached commissioners and corps to interfere, where there was need. Aulus Gabinius -the same who as tribune of the people had sent Pompeius to the East—had in 680 marched along the Tigris and then across Mesopotamia to Syria, to adjust the complicated affairs of Judaca. In like manner the severely pressed Damascus had already been occupied by Lollius and Metellus. afterwards another adjutant of Pompeius, Marcus Scaurus, arrived in Judaea, to allay the feuds ever breaking out afresh there. Lucius Afranius also, who during the expedition of Pompeius to the Caucasus held the command of the Roman troops in Armenia, had proceeded from Corduene (the northern Kurdistan) to upper Mesopotamia, and, after he had successfully accomplished the perilous march through the desert with the sympathising help of the Hellenes settled in Carrhae, brought the Arabs in Osroene to submission. Towards the end of End

Pompeius in person arrived in Syria, and remained there to the summer of the following year, resolutely interfering an regulating matters for the present and the future. He sough to restore the kingdom to its state in the better times of it Selecuid rule; all usurped powers were set aside, the robber chiefs were summoned to give up their castles, the Arab shell were again restricted to their desert domains, the affairs of the several communities were definitively regulated.

The legions stood ready to procure obedience to these stern orders, and their interference proved especially necessary against the audacious robber-chiefs. Subs the ruler of Lysus Dionysius the ruler of Tripolis, Ciny ms the ruler of Hyblus were taken prisoners in their fortresses and executed, the mountain and mantime strongholds of the Hyracians were broken up. Ptolemaeus son of Mennaeus was forced to purchase his freedom and his lordship with a ransom of 1000 talents ([21,9,000) Elsewhere the commands of the new master met for the most part with unresistance obedience.

The Jews alone hesitated. The mediators formerly sent by Pompeius, Gabinius and Scaurus, had—both, as it was sub, bribed with considerable sums—decided the dupute between the brothers Hyrcanus and Arstobulus in favour of the latter, and had also induced king Aretas to raise the siege of Jerusters—4 to proceed homeward, in doing which he sustained a defeat the Jews to resume then cally in the senate had recognised it about $27 (in, 57), and to in along with the hereditary principality itself all the confersion along with the hereditary principality itself all the conjects made by the Hammonacan princes. It was the Platrices, who had sent an embassy of two hundred of their most entirest ment to the Roman general and procured from his the overshow of the kingdom; not to the advantage of their own nation, but doubtless to that of the Romans, who from the native of the case could not but there ere ere to the follership of the Selecus!;

I Peropein spent the winter of *** _ = *** still in the taight work and of the Carp an Sea (Dan attail, ?) — In **/* be first reduced the last it with the still offering resistance in the high year of thoris, said then subsect our regulating matters exceptions, towards the work. The first work of both terminals in ***/* it is entired by the last that the first pan per another the days of the highest pan of the first pan per another than $1.5 \text{ for a per another

the Parthian king, was already part of this policy; it was a direct offence, when soon afterwards by the orders of Pompeius the younger Tigranes and his family were arrested and were not released even on Phraates interceding with the friendly general for his daughter and his son-in-law. But Pompeius paused not here. The province of Corduene, to which both Phraates and Tigranes laid claim, was at the command of Pompeius occupied by Roman troops for the latter, and the Parthians who were found in possession were driven beyond the frontier and pursued even as far as Arbela in Adiabene, without the government of Ctesiphon having been previously heard (680). Far the most suspicious circumstance however was, that the Romans seemed not at all inclined to respect the boundary of the Euphrates fixed by treaty. On several occasions Roman divisions destined from Armenia for Syria marched across Mesopotamia; the Arab emir Abgarus of Osroene was received under singularly favourable conditions into Roman protection; nay, Oruros, situated in upper Mesopotamia somewhere between Nisibis and the Tigris 220 miles eastward from the Commagenian passage of the Euphrates, was designated as the eastern limit of the Roman dominion-apparently their indirect dominion. inasmuch as the larger and more fertile northern half of Mesopotamia had been assigned by the Romans in like manner with Corduene to the Armenian empire. The boundary between Romans and Parthians thus became the great Syro-Mesopotamian desert instead of the Euphrates; and this too seemed only provisional. To the Parthian envoys, who came to insist on the maintenance of the agreements—which certainly, as it would seem, were only concluded orally-respecting the Euphrates boundary, Pompeius gave the ambiguous reply that the territory of Rome extended as far as her rights. The remarkable intercourse between the Roman commander-in-chief and the Parthian satraps of the region of Media and even of the distant province Elymais (between Susiana, Media, and Persia, in the modern Luristan) seemed a commentary on this speech. The

¹ This view rests on the marrative of Plutarch (Pomp. 36) which is supported by Strabo's (xvi. 744) description of the position of the satrap of Elymais. It is an embellishment of the matter, when in the lists of the countries and kings conquered by Pompeius Media and its king Darius are enumerated (Diodorus Fr. Vat. p. 140; Appian, Mithr. 117); and from this there has been further concocted the war of Pompeius with the Medes (Vell. ii. 40; Appian, Mithr. 105, 114) and then even his expedition to Ecbatana (Oros vi. 5). A confusion with the fabulous town of the same name on Carmel has hardly taken place here; it is simply that intolerable exaggeration—apparently originating in the grandiloquent and designedly

which broke out during this expedition, he was not reluctant to leave to his successor Marcus Scaurus the carrying out of the difficult enterprise against the Nabataean city situated far off amidst the desert. In reality Scaurus also soon found himself compelled to return without having accomplished his object. He had to content himself with making war on the Nabataeans maca persuaded Aretas to purchase a guarantee for all his possessions, Damascus included, from the Roman governor for a sum of money, r ''' the case solubles of the come of Scaurus, where a suppliant offering

Far more important than these new relations of the Romans to the Armenians, Iberians, Bosporans, and Nabataeans was a Syna they as had been

as nad peen autes while actes while as both

2 Ann was statement the hereted willimply as both sion that the Parthian by the kingdoms of kindred race paved the way first for inche destruction and then for his own Romans and Parthians in league had brought Armema to ruin, when it was overthrown Rome true to her old policy now reversed the parts and favoured the humbled foe at the expense of the powerful ally. The singular preference, which the father Tigranes experienced from Pompeius as contrasted with his son the ally and son-in-law of

&lt;sup>2</sup> Orosius indeed [vi 6] and Dio (xxxvi 25), both of them doubtless following Livy, make Pompeus get to Petra and occupy the city or even reach the Red Sea, but that he, on the contrary, soon after receiving the reach the Red Sea, but that he, on the contrary, soon after receiving the reach the Red Sea, but that he, on the contrary, soon after receiving the reach the Red Sea, but that he, on the contrary to the reach thought to the reach thought to the reach thought the receiving the reach thought the receiving the reach the

the Parthian king, was already part of this policy; it was a direct offence, when soon afterwards by the orders of Pompeius the younger Tigranes and his family were arrested and were not released even on Phraates interceding with the friendly general for his daughter and his son-in-law. But Pompeius paused not here. The province of Corduene, to which both Phraates and Tigranes laid claim, was at the command of Pompeius occupied by Roman troops for the latter, and the Parthians who were found in possession were driven beyond the frontier and pursued even as far as Arbela in Adiabene, without the government of Ctesiphon having been previously heard ( $\frac{689}{65}$ ). Far the most suspicious circumstance however was, that the Romans seemed not at all inclined to respect the boundary of the Euphrates fixed by treaty. On several occasions Roman divisions destined from Armenia for Syria marched across Mesopotamia; the Arab emir Abgarus of Osroene was received under singularly favourable conditions into Roman protection: nay, Oruros, situated in upper Mesopotamia somewhere between Nisibis and the Tigris 220 miles eastward from the Commagenian passage of the Euphrates, was designated as the eastern limit of the Roman dominion—apparently their indirect dominion, inasmuch as the larger and more fertile northern half of Mesopotamia had been assigned by the Romans in like manner with Corduene to the Armenian empire. The boundary between Romans and Parthians thus became the great Syro-Mesopotamian desert instead of the Euphrates; and this too seemed only provisional. To the Parthian envoys, who came to insist on the maintenance of the agreements—which certainly, as it would seem, were only concluded orally—respecting the Euphrates boundary, Pompeius gave the ambiguous reply that the territory of Rome extended as far as her rights. The remarkable intercourse between the Roman commander-in-chief and the Parthian satraps of the region of Media and even of the distant province Elymais (between Susiana, Media, and Persia, in the modern Luristan) seemed a commentary on this speech.<sup>1</sup> The

&lt;sup>1</sup> This view rests on the marrative of Plutarch (Pomp. 36) which is supported by Strabo's (xvi. 744) description of the position of the satrap of Elymais. It is an embellishment of the matter, when in the lists of the countries and kings conquered by Pompeius Media and its king Darius are enumerated (Diodorus Fr. Vat. p. 140; Appian, Mithr. 117); and from this there has been further concocted the war of Pompeius with the Medes (Vell. ii. 40; Appian, Mithr. 106, 114) and then even his expedition to Ecbatana (Oros vi. 5). A confusion with the fabulous town of the same name on Carmel has hardly taken place here; it is simply that intolerable exaggeration—apparently originating in the grandiloquent and designedly

- arl be and remote land endent cang to

offered ct that

the title of king or kurks. mceded to the Parthian king by the Romans in official intercourse, was now all at once exchanged by them for the simple title of king This was even more a threat than a violation of etiquette Since Rome had entered on the bentage of the Seleucids, it seemed almost as if the Romans had a mind to revert at a con venient moment to those old times when all Iran and Turan were ruled from Antioch, and there was as yet no Parthian empire but merely a Parthian satrapy The court of Ctesiphon would thus have had reason enough for going to war with Rome, it seemed the prelude to its doing so, when in of it declared war on Armenia on account of the question of the frontier But Phraates had not the courage to come to an open rupture with the Romans at a time when the dreaded general with his strong army was on the borders of the Parthian empire Pompeius sent commissioners to settle amicably the dispute between Parthia and Armenia Phraates yielded to the Roman -an h m and acquiesced in their award

tanna oo ind her husband graced the triumph of the Konna ven the Parthans trembled before the superior power of Rome, and, if they had not, like the inhabitants of Pontus and Armenia, succumbed to the Roman arms, the reason seemed only to be

that they had not ventured to stand the conflict

There still devolved on the general the daty of regulating the internal relations of the newly acquired provinces and of removing as far as possible the traces of a thirtten jears desolating war. The work of organisation begun in Asia Minor by Lucullus and the commission associated with him, and in Crete by Metellus, received its conclusion from Pornpeus. The former province of Asia, which embraced Mysia, Lydia, Phrygia, Caria, and Lycia, was converted from a frontier province into a central one. The newly-crected provinces were, that of amb guous bulletins of Pompeius—which has converted his ratin agains and guous bulletins of Pompeius—which has converted his ratin agains.

amb guous bulletins of Pompeius—which has converted his ratin again the Castulians (m. 324) into a march to the vest coast of Africa [Plut Pomp. 38) his abortive expedition against the habatarans into a conques of the city of Petra and his saward as to the boundaries of Armenia into a fixing of the boundary of the Roman emp ro beyond Asibles.

Bithynia and Pontus, which was formed out of the whole former kingdom of Nicomedes and the western half of the former Pontic state as far as and beyond the Halys; that of Cilicia, which indeed was older, but was now for the first time enlarged and organised in a manner befitting its name, and comprehended also Pamphylia and Isauria; that of Syria, and that of Crete. Much was no doubt wanting to render that mass of countries capable of being regarded as the territorial possession of Rome in the modern sense of the term. The form and order of the government remained substantially as they were; only the' Roman community came in place of the former monarchs. Those Asiatic provinces consisted as formerly of a motley mixture of domanial possessions, civic territories de facto or de jure autonomous, lordships pertaining to princes and priests, and kingdoms, all of which were as regards internal administration more or less left to themselves, and in other respects were dependent, sometimes in milder sometimes in stricter form, on the Roman government and its proconsuls very much as formerly on the great king and his satraps.

The first place, in rank at least, among the dependent dynasts was held by the king of Cappadocia, whose territory Lucullus had already enlarged by investing him with the province of Melitene (about Malatia) as far as the Euphrates, and to whom Pompeius farther granted on the western frontier some districts taken off Cilicia from Castabala as far as Derbe near Iconium, and on the eastern frontier the province of Sophene situated on the left bank of the Euphrates opposite Melitene and at first destined for the Armenian prince Tigranes; so that the most important passage of the Euphrates thus came wholly into the power of the Cappadocian prince. The small province of Commagene between Syria and Cappadocia with its capital Samosata' (Samsat) remained a dependent kingdom in the hands of the already named Seleucid Antiochus; 1 to him too were assigned the important fortress of Seleucia (near Biradjik) commanding the more southern passage of the Euphrates, and the adjoining tracts on the left bank of that river; and thus care was taken that the two chief passages of the Euphrates with a corresponding territory on the eastern bank were left in the hands of two dynasts wholly dependent on Rome Alongside of the kings of military service with the other small Roman clients, Denotaria had in these campaigns so brilliantly proved his trustworthiness and his energy as contrasted with all the indolent Orientals that the Roman generals conferred upon him, in addition to his Galatian heritage and his possessions in the rich country between Amisus and the mouth of the Halys, the eastern half of the former Pontic empire with the mantime towns of Pharnacia and Trapezus and the Pontic Armenia as far as the Colchian and Great-Armenian frontier, to form the kingdom of Lesser Armenia Soon afterwards he increased his already considerable territory by the country of the Celtic Trocmi, whose tetrarch he dispossessed Thus the petry feudatory became one of the most powerful dynasts of Asia Minor, to whom might be entristed the guardianship of an important part of the frontier of the empire

! The war which this Antiochus is alleged to have waged with Pompeius (Appian. Mithr. 106, 117) is not very consistent with the treaty which he concluded with Lucullus (Dio xxxvi. 4), and his undisturbed continuance in his sovereignty; 'probably it was concocted simply from the circumstance, that Antiochus of Commagene figured among the kings subdued by Pompeius.

empire
Vassals of lesser importance were the other numerous Galatian tetrarchs, one of whom, Bogodiatarus prince of the Troom, was on account of his tried valour in the Mithradatie war presented by Pompeius with the formerly Pontic frontiertown of Mithradatium, Attalus prince of Paphlagonia, who traced back his lineage to the old ribing house of the Pylacmenidae, Aristarchus and other petty lords in the Colchian territory, Tarcondimotus who ruled in eastem Claica in the mountain valleys of the Amanus, Prolemaeus son of Mennaeus who continued to rule in Chalcis on the Libanus, Aretas king of the Nabataeans as lord of Damascus, lastly, the Arabic emit in the countries on either side of the Euphrates, Abgarus in Osroene, whom the Romans endeavoured in every way to draw over to their interest with the view of using him as an advanced post against the Parthnans, Sampsiceramus in Hemesa, Alchaudonus: the Rhambaean, and another emit in Bostra. To these fell to be added the spiritual lords who in the East frequently ruled over land and people like secular dynasts, and whose authority firmly established in that native home of innaticism the Romans prudently retrained from disturbing, as they refrained from even robbing the temples of their treasures, the high priest of the Mother of the Gods in Pessinus; the two high priests of the goddess Ma in the Cappadocian Comana (on the upper Sarus) and in the Pontic city of the same name (Gumenek near Tocat), both lords who were in their countries inferior only to the king in power, and each of whom even at a much later period possessed extensive estates with special jurisdiction and about six thousand slaves—Archelaus, son of the general of that name who passed over from Mithradates to the Romans, was invested by Pompeius with the Pontic high priesthood; the high priest of the Venasian Zeus in the Cappadocian district of Morimene, whose revenues amounted annually to £3600 (15 talents); the "arch-priest and ruler" of that territory in Cilicia Trachea, where Teucer the son of Ajax had founded a temple to Zeus, over which his descendants presided by virtue of hereditary right; the "arch-priest and ruler of the people" of the Jews, to whom Pompeius, after having razed the walls of the capital and the royal treasuries and strongholds in the land, gave back the presidency of the nation with a serious admonition to keep the peace and no longer to aim at conquests.

Alongside of these secular and spiritual potentates stood the urban communities. These were partly associated into larger unions which rejoiced in a comparative independence, such as in particular the league of the twenty-three Lycian cities, which was well organised and constantly kept aloof from participation in the disorders of piracy; whereas the numerous detached communities, even if they had their self-government secured by charter, were in practice wholly dependent on the Roman governors.

The Romans failed not to see that with the task of representing Hellenism and protecting and extending the domain of Alexander in the East there devolved on them the primary duty of elevating the urban system; for, while cities are everywhere the pillars of civilisation, the antagonism between Orientals and Occidentals was most distinctly embodied in the contrast between the Oriental, military-despotic, feudal hierarchy and the Helleno-Italian urban commonwealth prosecuting trade and commerce. Lucullus and Pompeius, however little they in other respects aimed at the reduction of things to one level in the East, and however much the latter was disposed in questions of detail to censure and alter the arrangements of his predecessor, were yet completely agreed in the principle of promoting as far as they could an urban life in Asia Minor and Syria. Cyzicus, on whose vigorous resistance the first violence of the last war had spent itself, received from Lucullus a considerable extension of its domain. The Pontic Heraclea, energetically as it had resisted the Romans, yet recovered its territory and its harbours, and the barbarous fury of Cotta against the unhappy city met with the sharpest censure in the senate Lucullus had it and somerely regretted that fate had refused him the

partiy wit

for the reconstruction of the buildings account acted in the same spirit and on a greater scale. Even after

solated

and and especially in Jon, cus

is of pirates met with

on crime, 11 ..., neasure to set a premium and morally justifiable, for, as things then stood, piracy was something different from robbery and the prisoners might fairly be treated according to martial law

But Pompeus made it his business above all to promote urban files in the new Roman provinces. We have already observed how poorly provided with towns the Pontic empire was (in 264), most districts of Cappadocia even a century after this had no towns, but merely mountain fortresses as a refuge for the sign cultural population in war, the whole cast of Asia Minor, apart from the sparse Greek colonies on the coasts, must have been at this time in a similar plight. The number of towns newliestablished by Pompeius in these provinces is, including the Chicain settlements, stated at thirty nine, several of which attained great prosperity. The most notable of these townships in the former kingdom of Pontus were Nicopolis, the "city of victory," founded on the spot where Mithradates sustained the last decisive defeat (p. 125)—the fairest memorial of a general topines, Megadopolis, named from Pompeius.

De Off lil. 12 49) piratas namely, as those piratety conferred on them by al communities dependent

surname, on the frontier of Cappadocia and Lesser Armenia, the subsequent Sebasteia (now Siwas); Ziela, where the Romans fought the unfortunate battle (p. 67), a place which had arisen round the temple of Anaitis there and hitherto had belonged to its high priest, and to which Pompeius now gave the form and privileges of a city, Diospolis, formerly Cabira, afterwards Neocaesarea (Niksar), likewise one of the battle-fields of the late war; Magnopolis or Pompeiupolis, the restored Eupatoria at the confluence of the Lycus and the Iris, originally built by Mithradates, but again destroyed by him on account of its defection to the Romans (p. 109); Neapolis, formerly Phazemon, between Amasia and the Halys. Most of the towns thus established were formed not by bringing colonists from a distance, but by the suppression of villages and the collection of their inhabitants within the new ring-wall; in Nicopolis Pompeius settled the invalids and veterans of his army, who preferred to establish a home for themselves there at once rather than afterwards in Italy. But in other places also there arose at the beck of the regent new centres of Hellenic civilisation. In Paphlagonia a third Pompeiupolis marked the spot where the army of Mithradates in  $\frac{G_{6}G}{gg}$  achieved the great victory over the Bithynians (iii. 276). In Cappadocia, which perhaps had suffered more than any other province by the war, the royal residence Mazaca (afterwards Caesarea, now Kaisarieh) and seven other townships were restored by Pompeius and received urban institutions. In Cilicia and Coelesyria there were enumerated twenty cities laid out by Pompeius. In the districts ceded by the Jews, Gadara in the Decapolis rose from its ruins at the command of Pompeius, and the city of Seleucia was founded. By far the greater portion of the domain land at his disposal on the Asiatic continent must have been applied by Pompeius for his new settlements; whereas in Crete, about which Pompeius troubled himself little or not at all, the Roman domanial possessions seemed to have continued tolerably extensive.

Pompeius was no less intent on regulating and elevating the existing communities than on founding new ones. The abuses and usurpations which prevailed were reformed as far as lay in his power; copious ordinances drawn up carefully with reference to the different provinces regulated the municipal system in detail. A number of the most considerable cities had fresh privileges conferred on them. Autonomy, was bestowed on Antioch on the Orontes, the most important city of Roman Asia

Thus was completed the structure of the Roman state in Asia, which with its feudatory kings and vassals, its sacerdotal princes, and

in mind of th was no mirac

come or as respects the result obtained; nor was it rendered such by all the high-sounding words which the Roman world of quality lavished in favour of Lucullus and the artless multitude in praise of Pompeius Pompeius in particular consented to be praised, and praised himself, in such a fashion that people might almost have reckoned him still more weak-minded than he really was. His triumphal inscriptions enumerated twelve millions of people as subjugated and 1538 cities and strongholds as conquered-it seemed as if quantity was to make up for quality-and made the circle of his victories extend from the Macotic Sea to the Caspian and from the Caspian to the Red Sea, when his eyes had never seen any one of the three; nay farther, if he did not exactly say so, he at any rate induced the public to suppose that the annexation of Syria, which in truth

. ance amidst

eastern conquests was lost. The democratic serulity, which has at all times rivalled that of courts, readily entered into these insipid extravagances It was not satisfied by the pompous triumphal procession, which moved through the streets of Rome on the 28th and 29th September 62 - the forty-sixth birthday of Pomneurs the Great-adorned, to say nothing of jenels of all

Phraates; it rewarded its general, who nau conquise. two kings, with regal honours and bestowed on him the golden chaplet and the insignia of the magistracy for life. The coins struck in his honour exhibit the globe itself placed amidst the triple laurels brought home from the three continents, and surmounted by the golden chaplet conferred by the burgesses on the man who had triumphed over Africa, Spain, and Asia. It need excite no surprise, if in presence of such childish acts of homage voices were heard of an opposite import. Among the Roman world of quality it was currently affirmed that the true merit of having subdued the East belonged to Lucullus, and that Pompeius had only gone thither to supplant Lucullus and to plait the laurels which another hand had plucked around his own brow. Both statements were totally erroneous: it was not Pompeius but Glabrio that was sent to Asia to relieve Lucullus, and, bravely as Lucullus had fought, it was a fact that, when Pompeius took the supreme command, the Romans had forfeited all their earlier successes and had not a foot's breadth of Pontic soil in their possession. More pointed and effective was the ridicule of the inhabitants of the capital, who failed not to nickname the mighty conqueror of the globe after the great powers which he had conquered and saluted him now as "conqueror of Salem," now as "emir" (Arabarches), now as the Roman Sampsiceramus.

The unprejudiced judge will not agree either with those exaggerations or with these disparagements. Lucullus and Pompeius, in subduing and regulating Asia, showed themselves to be, not heroes and state-creators, but sagacious and energetic commanders and governors. As general Lucullus displayed no common talents and a self-confidence bordering on rashness, while Pompeius displayed military judgment and a rare selfrestraint; for hardly has any general with such forces and a position so wholly free ever acted so cautiously as Pompeius in the East. The most brilliant undertakings, as it were, offered themselves to him on all sides; he was free to start for the Cimmerian Bosporus and for the Red Sea; he had opportunity of declaring war against the Parthians; the revolted provinces of Egypt invited him to dethrone king Ptolemy who was not recognised by the Romans, and to carry out the testament of Alexander; but Pompeius marched neither to Panticapaeum nor to Petra, neither to Ctesiphon nor to Alexandria; throughout he plucked only those fruits which spontaneously came to his hand. In like manner he fought all his battles by sea and land with a crushing superiority of force. Had this moderation proceeded from the strict observance of the instructions given to him, as Pompeius was wont to profess, or even from a perception that the conquests of Rome must somewhere find a limit and that fresh accessions of territory were not advantageous to the state, it would deserve a higher praise than history confers on the most talented officer, but constituted as Pompeius was, his self restraint was beyond doubt solely the result of his peculiar want of decision and of initiative-defects, indeed, which were in his case far more useful to the state than the opposite excellences of his predecessor Certainly very grave errors were perpetrated both by Lucullus and by Pompeius Lucullus reaped their fruits himself, when his imprudent conduct wrested from him all the results of his victories. Pompeius left it to his successors to bear the consequences of his false policy towards the Parthians He might either have made war on the Parthuans, if he had had the courage to do so, or have maintained peace with them and recognised, as he had promised, the Euphrates as boundars, he was too timed for the former on van for the latter, and so be resorted to the silly

" and which the court of impossible through

llowing the enemy the most unbounded aggics . to choose of themselves the time for rupture and retaliation. As admir a more than princely wealth. I for its organisa rable promissory notes from the king of Cappadocia, from une such city of Antioch, and from other lords and communities. But such exactions had become almost a customary tribute, and both generals showed themselves at any rate to be not altogether venal in questions of greater importance, but if possible got themselves paid by the party whose interests coincided with those of Rome Looking to the times, this does not prevent us from characteris-

ing the administration of both as comparatively commendable and conducted primarily in the interest of Rome, secondarily in that of the provincials

The conversion of the clients into subjects, the better regulation of the eastern frontier, the establishment of a single and strong government, were full of blessing for the rulers as well as for the ruled The financial gain acquired by Rome was immense, the new property tax, which with the exception of some specially exempted communities all those princes, priests, and cities had to pay to Rome, raised the Roman state-revenues almost by a half above their former amount. Asia indeed suffered severely Pompeius brought in money and jewels an amount of $2,000,000 (200,000,000 sesterces) into the state-chest and distributed £3,000,000 (16,000 talents) among his officers and soldiers, if we add to this the considerable sums brought home by Lucullus, the non-official exactions of the Roman army, and the amount of the damage done by the war. the financial exhaustion of the land may be readily conceived. The Roman taxation of Asia was perhaps in itself not worse than that of its earlier rulers, but it formed a heavier burden on the land in so far as the taxes thenceforth went out of the country and only the lesser portion of the proceeds was again expended in Asia; and at any rate it was, in the old as well as the newly-acquired provinces, based on a systematic plundering of the provinces for the benefit of Rome. But the responsibility for this rests far less on the generals personally than on the parties at home, whom these had to consider; Lucullus had even exerted himself energetically to set limits to the usurious dealings of the Roman capitalists in Asia, and this essentially contributed to bring about his fall. How much both men earnestly sought to revive the prosperity of the reduced provinces, is shown by their action in cases where no considerations of party policy tied their hands, and especially in their care for the cities of Asia Minor. Although for centuries afterwards many an Asiatic village lying in ruins recalled the times of the great war, Sinope might well begin a new era with the date of its restoration by Lucullus, and almost all the more considerable inland towns of the Pontic kingdom might gratefully honour Pompeius as their founder. The organisation of Roman Asia by Lucullus and Pompeius may with all its undeniable defects be described as on the whole judicious and praiseworthy; serious as were the evils that might still adhere to it, it could not but be welcome to the sorely tormented Asiatics for the very reason that it came attended by the inward and outward peace, the absence of which had been so long and so painfully felt.

Peace continued substantially in the East, till the idea—merely indicated by Pompeius with his characteristic timidity—of joining the regions eastward of the Euphrates to the Roman empire was taken up again energetically but unsuccessfully by the new triumvirate of Roman regents, and soon thereafter the civil war drew the eastern provinces as well as all the rest into its fatal vortex. In the interval the governors of Cilicia had to fight constantly with the mountain-tribes of the Amanus and those of Syria with the hordes of the desert, and in the latter war against the Bedouins more especially many Roman troops were destroyed; but these movements had no further significance. More remarkable was the obstinate resistance, which the tough Jewish nation opposed to the conquerors. Alexander son of the deposed king Aristobulus, and Aristobulus himself who after a time succeeded in escaping from captivity, excited during the governorship of Aulus Gabinus (%) - % three different revolts against the new rulers, to each of which the government of the

to kick against the pricks; as indeed the last and most dangerous of these revolts, for which the withdrawal of the Syrian army of occupation in consequence of the Egyptian crisis furnished the immediate impulse, began with the murder of the Romans settled in Palestine. It was not without difficulty that the able governor succeeded in rescuing the few Romans, who had escaped the same fate and found a temporary refuge on Mount Gerizim, from the insurgents who kept them blockaded there, and in overpowering the revolt after several severely contested hattles and tedious sieges. In consequence of this the monarchy of the high priests was abolished and the Jewish land was broken up, as Macedonia had formerly been, into five independent districts administered by governing colleges with an optimate organisation; Samaria and other places razed by the Jews were restored, to form a counterpose to Jerusalem; and lastly a heavier tribute was imposed on the Jews than on the other Syrian subjects of Rome.

It still remains that we should glance at the kingdom of Egypt along with the last dependency that remained to it of the extensive conquests of the Lagdac, the fair island of Cyprus. Egypt was now the only state of the Hellenic Last that was still at least nominally independent; just as formerly, when the Persians established themselves along the eastern half of the Mediterranean, Egypt was their last conquest, so now the mighty conquerors from the West long delayed the annexation of that opulent and peculiar country. The reason lay, as was already indicated, neither in any fear of the resistance of Egypt or in the want of a fitting occasion. Egypt was nearly as powerless as Syria, and had already in '47 fallen in all due form of law to the Roman community (p. 4.5). The control excreted over the court of Alexandria by the royal guard—which appointed and deposed ministers and occasionally kings, took for itself what it pleased, and, if it was refused a rise of pay, besieged the king in his palace—was by no means liked in the country or rather in the capital (for the country with its population of agricultural slaves was hardly taken into account); and at least a party there wished for the annexation of Egypt by Rome, and even took steps to procure it. But the less the kings of Egypt could think of contending in arms against Rome, the more energetically Egyptian gold resisted the Roman plans of union; and in consequence of the peculiar despotico-communistic centralisation of the Egyptian finances the revenues of the court of Alexandria were still nearly equal to the public income of Rome even after its augmentation by Pompeius. The suspicious jealousy of the oligarchy, which was chary of allowing any individual either to conquer or to administer Egypt, operated in the same direction. So the defacto rulers of Egypt and Cyprus were enabled by bribing the leading men in the senate not merely to respite their tottering crowns, but even to fortify them afresh and to purchase from the senate the confirmation of their royal title. But with this they had not yet obtained their object. Formal state-law required a decree of the Roman burgesses; until this was issued, the Ptolemies were dependent on the caprice of every democratic ruler, and they had thus to commence the warfare of bribery also against the other Roman party, which as the more powerful stipulated for far higher prices.

The result in the two cases was different. The annexation of Cyprus was decreed in  $\frac{6.96}{6.8}$  by the people, that is, by the leaders of the democracy, the support given to piracy by the Cypriots being alleged as the official reason why that course should now be adopted. Marcus Cato, entrusted by his opponents with the execution of this measure, came to the island without an army; but he had no need of one. The king took poison; the inhabitants submitted without offering resistance to their inevitable fate, and were placed under the governor of Cilicia. The ample treasure of nearly 7000 talents (£1,700,000), which the equally covetous and miserly king could not prevail on himself to apply for the bribes requisite to save his crown, fell along with the latter to the Romans, and filled after a desirable fashion the empty vaults of their treasury.

On the other hand the brother who reigned in Egypt succeeded in purchasing his recognition by decree of the people from the new masters of Rome in  $\frac{6.95}{5.0}$ ; the purchase-money is said to have amounted to 6000 talents (£1,460,000). The citizens indeed, long exasperated against their good flute-player and bad ruler, and now reduced to extremities by the definitive loss of Cyprus and the pressure of the taxes which were raised to an intolerable degree in consequence of the transactions with

andreas that de an abatha and a cold to man

at a man mannable and salt to san that it may their distinct important charge of occupying Egypt by force along with the perquisites thence to be expected should be assigned. It was only when the triumvirate was confirmed anew at the conference of Luca, that this affair was also arranged, after Ptolemaeus had agreed to a further payment of 10,000 talents ((2,400,000); the governor of Syria, Aulus Gabinius, now obtained orders from those in power to take the necessary steps immediately for restoring the king. The citizens of Alexandria had meanwhile placed the crown on the head of Berenice the eldest daughter of the ejected king, and given her a husband in the person of one of the spiritual princes of Roman Asia, Archelaus the high priest of Comana (p. 135), who possessed ambition enough to hazard his secure and respectable position in the hope of mounting the throne of the Lagidae. His attempts to gain the Roman regents to his interests remained without success; but he did not recoil before the idea of being obliged to maintain his new kingdom with arms in hand even against

Gabinius, without ostensible powers to undertake war again

Egypt but directed to do so by the regents, made a pretext of of the alleged support of piracy by the Egyptians and the build mg of a fleet by Archelaus, and started without delay for th Egyptian frontier ( ( The march through the sandy deser between Gaza and Pelusium, in which so many invasion previously directed against Egypt had broken down, was of this occasion successfully accomplished—a result especially duto the quick and skilful leader of the cavalry Marcus Antonius The frontier fortress of Pelusium also was surrendered withou resistance by the Jewish garrison stationed there. In front o this city the Romans met the Egyptians, defeated them-or which occasion Antonius again distinguished himself-and arrived, as the first Roman army, at the Nile Here the fleet and army of the Egyptians were drawn up for the last decisive struggle; but the Romans once more conquered, and Archelaus himself with many of his followers perished in the combat Immediately after this battle the capital surrendered, and therewith all resistance was at an end. The unhappy land was handed over to its legitimate oppressor; the hanging and beheading, with which, but for the intervention of the chivalrous Antonius, Ptolemaeus would have already in Pelusium begun to celebrate the restoration of the legitimate government, now took its course unhindered, and first of all the innocent daughter was sent by her father to the scaffold. The payment of the reward agreed upon with the regents broke down through the absolute impossibility of exacting from the exhausted land the enormous sums required, although they took from the poor people the last penny; but care was taken that the country should at least be kept quiet by the garrison of Roman infantry and Celtic and German cavalry left in the capital, which took the place of the native praetorians and otherwise emulated them not unsuccessfully. The previous hegemony of Rome over Egypt was thus converted into a direct military occupation. and the nominal continuance of the native monarchy was not so much a privilege granted to the land as a double burden imposed on it.

him to deviate from the traditionary moral and political catechism of the aristocracy, and thus of course he worked as often into the hands of his opponents as into those of his own party. The Don Quixote of the aristocracy, he proved by his character and his actions that at this time, while there was contained the course of the aristocracy.

honour. Yet the attacks of the democracy on the vanquished for naturally dud not cease. The pack of the Populares threw themselves on the broken ranks of the nobility like the sutlers on tuen in good humour by the extravagant magnificence of his games ("si")—in which all the equipments, even the cages of the wild beasts, appeared of massive silver—and generally by a liberality which was all the more princely that it was based solely on the contraction of debt. The attacks on the nobility were of the most varied kind The abuses of arristoctate rule afforded copious materials, magistrates and advocates who were hiberal or assumed a liberal hue, like Gaius Comelius, Aluis Gabinuss, Marcus Ciecro, continued systematically to uaveil the most offensive and scandalous aspects of the Optimate doings and to propose laws against them. The senate was directed to give access to foreign envoys on set days, with the view of preventing the usual postponement of audiences. Lona borrowed from foreign ambassadors in Rome were declared non-actionable, as this was the only means of access to the preventing the sun postponement of audiences.

laws was restricted (%%); as was also the abuse whereby every noble Roman, who had private business to attend to in the provinces, got himself invested with the character of a Roman envoy thither (%%). They heightened the penalities against the purchase of votes and electioneering intrigues (%%, %%); which latter were especially increased in a scandalous fashion by the attempts of the individuals ejected from the senate (p. oo) to get back to it through re-election. What had hitherto been understood as a matter of course was now expressly lad own as a law, that the practors were bound to administer ustice in conformity with the rules set forth by them, as was the Roman use and wont, at their entering on office (%%).

But, above all, efforts were made to complete the democratic restoration and to realise the leading ideas of the Gracchan period in a form suitable to the times. The election of the priests by the comitia, which Gnaeus Domitius had introduced (iii. 192) and Sulla had again done away (iii. 341), was restored by a law of the tribune of the people Titus Labienus in 601. The democrats were fond of pointing out how much was still wanting towards the restoration of the Sempronian corn-laws in their full extent, and at the same time passed over in silence the fact that under the altered circumstances-with the straitened condition of the public finances and the great increase in the number of fully privileged Roman citizens—that restoration was absolutely impracticable. In the country between the Po and the Alps they zealously fostered the agitation for political equality with the Italians. As early as 686 Gaius Caesar travelled from place to place there for this purpose; in 689 Marcus Crassus as censor made arrangements to enrol the inhabitants directly in the burgess-roll-which was only frustrated by the resistance of his colleague; in the following censorships this attempt seems regularly to have been repeated. As formerly Gracchus and Flaccus had been the patrons of the Latins, so the present leaders of the democracy gave themselves forth as protectors of the Transpadanes, and Gaius Piso (consul in 687) had bitterly to regret that he had ventured to outrage one of these clients of Caesar and Crassus. On the other hand the same leaders appeared by no means disposed to advocate the political equalisation of the freedmen; the tribune of the people Gaius Manilius, who in a thinly attended assembly had procured the renewal (3r December 687) of the Sulpician law as to the suffrage of freedmen (iii. 244), was immediately disavowed by the leading men of the democracy, and with their consent the law was cancelled on the very day after its passing by the senate. In the same spirit all the strangers, who possessed neither Roman nor Latin burgess-rights, were ejected from the capital by decree of the people in 680. It is obvious that the intrinsic inconsistency of the Gracchan policy-in abetting at once the effort of the excluded to obtain admission into the circle of the privileged, and the effort of the privileged to maintain their distinctive rights—had passed over to their successors; while Caesar and his friends on the one hand held forth to the Transpadanes the prospect of the franchise, they on the other hand gave their assent to the continuance of the disabilities of the freedmen, and to the barbarous setting aside of the rivalry which the industry and trading skill of the Hellenes and Oneatals maintained with the Italians in Italy itself

The mode in which the democracy dealt with the ancient criminal jurisdiction of the comitia was characteristic It had not been properly abolished by Sulla, but practically the jury commissions on high treason and murder had superseded it (iii 350), and no rational man could think of seriously restoring the old procedure which long before Sulla had been thoroughly impracticable. But as the idea of the sovereignty of the people appeared to require a recognition at least in principle of the criminal jurisdiction of the burgesses, the tribune of the people Titus Labienus in 27 brought the old man, who thirty-eight years before had slain or was alleged to have slain the tribune of the people Lucius Saturninus (in 202), before the same high court of criminal jurisdiction, by virtue of which, if the annals reported truly, king Tulius had procured the acquittal of the Horatius who had killed his sister The accused was one Gains Rabirius, who, if he had not killed Saturninus, had at least paraded with his cut off head at the tables of the nobles, and who moreover was notorious among the Apulian landholders for his kidnapping and his bloody deeds The object, if not of the accuser himself, at any rate of the more sagacious men who backed him, was not at all to make this pitiful wretch die the death of the cross, they were not unwilling to acquiesce, when first the form of the impeachment was materially modified by the senate, and then the assembly of the people called to pronounce sentence on the guilty was dissolved under some prefert by the apposite party—so that the whole procedure was set . 47 - malladia of Roman aside the mysolability freedom, established as of the tribunes of the people, were practical rights, and the legal basis on which the democracy rested was vindicated afresh

The democratic reaction manifested still greater vehemence in all personal questions, wherever it could and dared Prudence indeed enjoined it not to urge the restoration of the estates confiscated by Sulla to their former owners, that it might not quarrel with its own allies and at the same time get into a conflict with material interests, for which a policy based on theory is rarely a match, the recall of the emigrants was too closely connected with this question of property not to appear equally unadvisable On the other hand great exertions were made to restore to the children of the proscribed the political rights withdrawn from them  $\binom{691}{63}$ , and the heads of the senatorial party were incessantly subjected to personal attacks. Thus Gaius Memmius instituted a party process against Marcus Lucullus in 688. Thus they allowed his more famous brother to wait for three years before the gates of the capital for his welldeserved triumph (688 = 691). Quintus Rex and the conqueror of Crete Quintus Metellus were similarly insulted. It produced a still greater sensation, when the young leader of the democracy Gaius Caesar in 691 not merely presumed to compete with the two most distinguished men of the nobility, Quintus Catulus and Publius Servilius the victor of Isaura, in the candidature for the supreme pontificate, but even carried the day among the burgesses. The heirs of Sulla, especially his son Faustus, found themselves constantly threatened with an action for the refunding of the public moneys which, it was alleged, had been embezzled by the regent. They talked even of resuming the democratic impeachments suspended in 664 on the basis of the Varian law (iii. 223). The individuals who had taken part in the Sullan executions were, as may readily be conceived, judicially prosecuted with most zeal. When the quaestor Marcus Cato, in his awkard integrity, himself made a beginning by demanding back from them the rewards which they had received for murder as property illegally alienated from the state  $(\frac{689}{65})$ , it can excite no surprise that in the following year  $\binom{690}{64}$  Gaius Caesar, as president of the commission regarding murder, summarily treated the clause in the Sullan ordinance, which declared that a proscribed person might be killed with impunity, as null and void, and caused the most noted of Sulla's executioners, Lucius Catilina, Lucius Bellienus, Lucius Luscius to be brought before his jurymen and, partially, to be condemned.

Lastly, they did not hesitate now to name once more in public the long-proscribed names of the heroes and martyrs of the democracy, and to celebrate their memory. We have already mentioned how Saturninus was rehabilitated by the process directed against his murderer. But a different sound had the name of Gaius Marius, at the mention of which all hearts once had thrilled; and it happened that the man, to whom Italy owed her deliverance from the northern barbarians, was at the same time the uncle of the present leader of the democracy. Loudly had the multitude rejoiced, when in  $\frac{6.8 \, 6}{6.8}$  Gaius Caesar ventured in spite of the prohibitions publicly to show the honoured features of the hero in the Forum at the interment of the widow of Marius. But when, three years afterwards ( $\frac{6.8.9}{6.5}$ ), the emblems of victory, which Marius had caused to be erected in the Capitol and Sulla had ordered to be thrown down, one mom ing unexpectedly glittered airesh in gold and marble at the old spot, the veterans from the African and Cimbrian wars crowded, with tears in their eyes, around the statue of their beloved general, and in presence of the rejoicing masses the senate did not venture to seize the trophies which the same bold hand had renewed in defiance of the laws

But all these doings and disputes, however much noise they made, were, politically considered, of but very subordinate importance The oligarchy was vanquished, the democracy had attained the helm. That underlings of various grades should hasten to inflict an additional kick on the prostrate foe, that the democrats also should have their groundwork of law and their worship of principles, that their doctrinaires should not rest till the whole privileges of the commons were in all particulars restored, and should in that respect occasionally make themselves ridiculous, as legitimists are wont to do-all this was just as much to be expected as it was matter of in difference Taken as a whole, the agitation was aimless, and we discern in it the perplexity of its authors to find an object for their activity, for it turned almost wholly on things already essentially settled or on subordinate matters

It could not be otherwise In the struggle with the anitocrac; the democrats had remained victors, but they had not conquered alone, and the fiery trial still awaited them—the

not with their former for, but with their too powerful, to whom in the struggle with the aristocracy they were sublly indebted for victory, and to whose hands they had now they dared not refuse it to him. The general of the East and of the seas was still employed in appointing and deposing largs. How long time he would take for that work, or when he would declare the business of the war to be ended, no one could tell but himself, since like everything else the time of his return to Italy, or in other words the day of decision, was left in his own hands. The parties in Rome meanwhile sta find ward The Optimates in Rome meanwhile sta find ward to dreaded general with comparative calimness, by the rupture between Pompeius and the democracy, which they saw to be approaching, they could not lose, but could only gain democrats on the contrary waited with panful anarcty, as sought, during the interval still allowed to them by the absence of Pompeius, to lay a counter mine against the impending explosion.

In this policy they again coincided with Crassus, to whom no course was left for encountering his envied and hated rival but that of allying himself afresh, and more closely than before, with the democracy. Already in the first coalition a special approximation had taken place between Caesar and Crassus as the two weaker parties; a common interest and a common danger tightened yet more the bond which joined the richest and the most insolvent of Romans in closest alliance. While in public the democrats described the absent general as the head and pride of their party and seemed to direct all their arrows against the aristocracy, preparations were secretly made against Pompeius; and these attempts of the democracy to escape from the impending military dictatorship have historically a far higher significance than the noisy agitation, for the most part employed only as a mask, against the nobility. It is true that they were carried on amidst a darkness, upon which our tradition allows only some stray gleams of light to fall; for not the present alone, but the succeeding age also had its reasons for throwing a veil over the matter. But in general both the course and the object of these efforts are completely clear. The military power could only be effectually checkmated by another military power. The design of the democrats was to possess themselves of the reins of government after the example of Marius and Cinna, then to : entrust one of their leaders either with the conquest of Egypt or with the governorship of Spain or some similar ordinary or extraordinary office, and thus to find in him and his troops a counterpoise to Pompeius and his army. For this they required a revolution, which was directed immediately against the nominal government, but in reality against Pompeius as the designated monarch; 1 and, to effect this revolution, there was from the passing of the Gabinio-Manilian laws down to the return of Pompeius  $\binom{688}{66} = \binom{69}{62}$  perpetual conspiracy in Rome. The capital was in anxious suspense; the depressed temper of the capitalists,

Any one who surveys the whole state of the political relations of this period will need no special proofs to help him to see that the ultimate object of the democratic machinations in  $\frac{GRR}{GL}$  et seq. was the overthrow not of the senate, but of Pompeius. Yet such proofs are not wanting. Sallust states that the Gabinio-Manilian laws inflicted a mortal blow on the democracy (Cat. 39); that the conspiracy of  $\frac{GRR}{GL} = \frac{GRR}{GL}$  and the Servilian rogation were specially directed against Pompeius, is likewise attested (Sallust, Cat. 19; Val. Max. vi. 2, 4; Cic. de Lege Agr. ii. 17, 46). Besides the attitude of Crassus in relation to the conspiracy alone shows sufficiently that it was directed against Pompeius.

the suspensions of payment, the frequent bankruptors were heralds of the fermenting revolution, which seemed as though it must at the same time produce a totally new position of parties The project of the democracy, which pointed beyond the senate at Pompeius, suggested an approximation between that general and the senate The democracy moreover, in no to onnose to the dictatorship of Pompenis that of

- ad strictly speaking, in its reality drove out Satan by Beelzebub, the question of iles became in its hands a question of persons

The first step therefore towards the revolution projected by the leaders of the democracy was to be the overthrow of the existing government by means of an insurrection primarily instigated in Rome by democratic consultators. The moral condition of the lowest as of the highest ranks of society in the capital presented the materials for this purpose in lamentable abundance We need not here repeat what was the character of the free and the servile proletariate of the capital. The significant saying was already heard, that only the poor man was qualified to represent the poor, the idea was thus suggested, that the mass of the poor might constitute itself an independent power as well as the oligarchy of the rich, and instead of allowing itself to be tyrannised over, might in its own turn play the tyrant But even in the circles of the young men of rank similar ideas found an echo. The fashionable life of the capital deranged not merely the fortunes of men, but also their vigour of body and mind That elegant world of fragrant ringlets, of fashionable mustachios and ruffles-merry as were its doings in the dance and with the harp, and early and late at the wine-cupyet concealed in its bosom an alarming abyss of moral and economic rum, of well or ill concealed despair, and frantic or knavish resolves These circles sighed without disguise for a return of the time of Cinna with its proscriptions and confisca one and its annihilation of creditors' claims, there were people to o of no mean descent and unusual and of robbers which they had squandered Where a band gathers, ing, and in this case the men were soon found who were fitted to be captains of banditti

on civil society as a

The late practor Lucius Catilina, and the quaestor Gnacus Piso, were distinguished among their fellows not merely by their noble birth and their superior rank. They had broken down the bridge completely behind them, and impressed their accomplices by their dissoluteness quite as much as by their talents. Catilina in particular was one of the most nefarious men in that nefarious age. His villanies belong to the records of crime, not to history; but his very outward appearance—the pale countenance, the wild glance, the gait by turns sluggish and hurried—betrayed his dismal past. He possessed in a high degree the qualities which are required in the leader of such a band—the faculty of enjoying all pleasures and of bearing all privations, courage, military talent, knowledge of men, the energy of a felon, and that horrible mastery of vice which knows how to bring the weak to fall, and how to train the fallen to crime.

To form out of such elements a conspiracy for the overthrow of the existing order of things could not be difficult to men who possessed money and political influence. Catilina, Piso, and their fellows entered readily into any plan which gave the prospect of proscriptions and cancelling of debts; the former had moreover special hostility to the aristocracy, because it had opposed the candidature of that infamous and dangerous man for the consulship. As he had formerly in the character of an executioner of Sulla hunted the proscribed at the head of a band of Celts and had killed among others his own aged father-in-law with his own hand, he now readily consented to promise similar services to the opposite party. A secret league was formed. The number of individuals received into it is said to have exceeded 400; it included associates in all the districts and urban communities of Italy; besides which, as a matter of course, numerous recruits would flock unbidden from the ranks of the dissolute youth to an insurrection which inscribed on its banner the seasonable programme of the abolition of debts.

In December  $\frac{6.8}{6.6}$ —so we are told—the leaders of the league thought that they had found the fitting occasion for striking a blow. The two consuls chosen for  $\frac{6.89}{6.5}$ , Publius Cornelius Sulla and Publius Autronius Paetus, had recently been judicially convicted of electoral bribery, and therefore had according to legal rule forfeited their expectancy of the highest office. Both thereupon joined the league. The conspirators resolved to procure the consulship for them by force, and so to put themselves in possession of the supreme power in the state. On the day when the new consuls should enter on their office—the 1st January  $\frac{6.89}{6.5}$ —the senate-house was to be assailed by armed the suspensions of payment, the frequent bankruptices were heralds of the fermenting revolution, which seemed as though it must at the same time produce a totally new position of parties. The project of the democracy, which pointed beyond the senate at Pompeus, suggested an approximation between that general and the senate. The democracy moreover, in attempting to oppose to the dictatorship of Pompeus that of a man more agreeable to it, recognised, strictly speaking, in its turn the military government, and in reality drove out Satan by Beelzebub, the question of principles became in its hands a question of persons.

The first step therefore towards the revolution projected by the leaders of the democracy was to be the overthrow of the easisting government by means of an insurrection primarily instigated in Rome by democratic conspirators. The moral condition of the lowest as of the highest ranks of society in the capital presented the materials for this purpose in lamentable abundance. We need not here repeat what was the character of the free and the service proletariate of the capital. The significant taying was already heard, that only the poor man was qualified to represent the poor, the idea was thus suggested,

But even in the circles of the young men of and similar ideas found an echo. The fashionable life of the capital denaged not merely the fortunes of men, but also their vigour of body and mind. That elegant world of fragmant ringlets, of labora able mustachos and rifles—merry as were its doings at the dance and with the harp, and early and late at the wine-up-yet concealed in its boson an alarming abyss of moral and economic rum, of well or ill concealed despair, and fantic or knavish resolves. These circles sighed without disguise for a fecturn of the time of Cuna with its proscriptions and confiscations and its annihilation of creditors claims, there were people enough, including not a few of no mean descent and musual abilities, who only waited the signal to fall like a gang of robber on civil society and to recruit by pillage the fortune which they had squandered. Where a band gathers, leaders are not wanting, and in this case the men were soon found who were fitter to be captains of bandities.

The late practor Lucius Catilina, and the quaestor Guans Piso, were distinguished among their fellows not merely by their noble birth and their superior rank. They had broken down the bridge completely behind them, and impressed their accomplices by their dissoluteness quite as much as by their talents. Catilina in particular was one of the most nefarious men in that nefarious age. His villanies belong to the records of crime, not to history; but his very outward appearance—the pale countenance, the wild glance, the gait by turns sluggish and hurried—betrayed his dismal past. He possessed in a high degree the qualities which are required in the leader of such a band—the faculty of enjoying all pleasures and of bearing all privations, courage, military talent, knowledge of men, the energy of a felon, and that horrible mastery of vice which knows how to bring the weak to fall, and how to train the fallen to crime.

To form out of such elements a conspiracy for the overthrow of the existing order of things could not be difficult to men who possessed money and political influence. Catilina, Piso, and their fellows entered readily into any plan which gave the prospect of proscriptions and cancelling of debts; the former had moreover special hostility to the aristocracy, because it had opposed the candidature of that infamous and dangerous man opposed the candidature of that infamous the charger of an for the consulship. As he had formerly in the charger of an ad of a band for the consulship. As he had formerly in the father-in-law executioner of Sulla hunted the proscribed at the father-in-law of Celts and had killed among others his own to promise similar with his own hand, he now readily content league was formed. services to the opposite party ed into it is said to have services to the opposite party ed into it is said to have the number of individuals ides which, as a matter of course, urban communities of Italy in which inscribed on its banner dissolute youth to an insurable in abolition of debts. The seasonable programme fitting occasion for striking a thought that they had for had recently been judicially and Publius Autronius and therefore had according to convicted of electoral brown the conspirators resolved to the consulship hould enter on their office—the selves in possession of house was to be assailed by armed selves in possession of house was to be assailed by armed occasion they had set up as candidates for the consulship Catilina himself and Gaus Antonius, the younger son of the orator and a brother of the general notorious for his failure at Crete _ They were sure of Catilina, Antonius, originally a Sullan like Catilina and like the latter hrought to trul on that account some years hefore hy the democratic party and ejected from the senate (pp 85, 91)—otherwise an iodolent, insignificant man, in no respect called to be a leader, and utterly hankrupt—willingly lent hunself as a tool to the democrats for the prize of the at the advantages ottached to it Through these and to seize the governtho remained in the

Le provinces against

the capital, insurrection in Hither Spain Communication could not be held with him the governor Gnaeus Piso was to lawt

by way of the sea, since Pompeius commanded the seas To procure this they reckoned on the Transpadanes the old clients of the democracy—among whom there was great agitation, and who would of course have at once received the franchise—and, further, on different Celtic tribes 1 The threads of this com ther, on timerent center times of the conspirators.

One of the conspirators, from Nucerna, compelled of the conspirators, of the consp

t, and with these handered about as a leader of free-lances in western Africa, where he had old husiness connections

The party put forth all its energies for the struggle of the election Crassus and Caesar staked their money—whether their own or borrowed—and their connections to procure the C Lee and Antonius, the comrades of Catilina .La man who promised laces and estates from their dehts. ond who, they knew, would keep his word lhe anistocracy was of their opponents, and above in great perplexity, chiefly because it could not even start in great perpensity, emery because it could not controlled to the his head, counter-candidates. That such a candidate risked his head, was ohvious, and the times were past when the post of danger ollured the hurgess—now even amhition was hushed in presence onated the autgess—now even annation was musical at presented of fear Accordingly the nobility cootented themselves with ranking a feelle ottempt to check electioneering intrigues by The Ambrana (Suet Cars 9) are probably not the Ligurian Ambrones (Plutarch Mar 19), but a initiate of the pen for Arrena issuing a new law respecting bribery—which, however, was thwarted by the veto of a tribune of the people-and with turning over their votes to a candidate who, although not acceptable to them, was at least inoffensive. This was Marcus Cicero, notoriously a political trimmer, accustomed to flirt at times with the democrats, at times with Pompeius, at times from a somewhat greater distance with the aristocracy, and to lend his services as an advocate to every influential man under impeachment without distinction of person or party (henumbered even Catilina among his clients); belonging properly to no party or-which was much the same-to the party of material interests which was dominant in the courts and was pleased with the eloquent pleader and the polite and witty companion. connections enough in the capital and the country towns to have a chance alongside of the candidates proposed by the democracy; and as the nobility, although with reluctance, and the Pompeians voted for him, he was elected by a great majority. The two candidates of the democracy obtained almost the same number of votes; but a few more fell to Antonius, whose family was of more consideration than that of his fellow-candidate. This accident frustrated the election of Catilina, and saved Rome from a second Cinna. A little before this Piso had-it was said at the instigation of his political and personal enemy Pompeius —been put to death in Spain by his native escort.2 With the consul Antonius alone nothing could be done; Cicero broke the loose bond which attached him to the conspiracy, even before they entered on their offices, inasmuch as he renounced his legal privilege of having the consular provinces determined by lot, and handed over to his deeply-embarrassed colleague the lucrative governorship of Macedonia. The essential preliminary conditions of this project also had therefore miscarried.

Meanwhile the aspect of Oriental affairs grew daily more perilous for the democracy. The settlement of Syria rapidly advanced; already invitations had been addressed to Pompeius from Egypt to march thither and occupy the country for Rome; they could not but be afraid that they would next hear of Pompeius in person having taken possession of the valley of the

pr. ex s. c. provinciam Hispaniam citeriorem obtinuit.

&lt;sup>1</sup> This cannot well be expressed more naïvely than is done by his own brother (De Pet Cons. 1, 5; 13, 51, 53; in  $\frac{690}{64}$ ). In proof of this, unprejudiced persons will read not without interest the second oration against Rullus, where the "first democratic consul," gulling the friendly public in a very delectable fashion, unfolds to it the "true democracy."

<sup>2</sup> His epitaph still extant runs: Cn. Calpurnius Cn. f. Piso quaestor pro

Nile It was by this very apprehension probably that the attempt of Caesar to get himself sent by the people to Egypt ung against his rebellious subjects against the interest of Pompeius. His return home, and the probable catastrophe which it involved, were always drawing the nearer, often as the sting of the bow had been broken, it was necessary that there should be a fresh attempt to bend it. The city was in suffen ferment, frequent conferences of the heads of the movement indicated that some step was again contemplated.

ailed, apparently through the dis to undertake anything whatever

What they wished became manifest when the rew tithures of the people entered on their office (10th December *\foxup*) and one of them, Publius Servilius Ruilius, immediately proposed a agrarian law, which was designed to procure for the leaders of the democrats a position similar to that which Pompeius occupied in consequence of the Gabinio-Manilian proposals. The rominal object was the founding of colonies in Italy. The ground for these, however, was not to be gained by dispossession, on the contrary all existing private rights were guaranteed, and even the illegal occupations of the most recent times (p. 83) were converted into full property. The leased Campanian domain alone was to be parcelled out and colonised, in other cases government was to acquire the land destined for assignation by ordinary purchase. To procure the sums necessary for this purpose, the remaining Itahan, and more especially all the evera Itahan, domain land was successively to be brought to sale, which was understood to include the former royal hunting domains in Macedonia, the Thracian Chersonese, Bithyria, Pontus, Cyrer

in full proper and Cilicia

and Chicia had acquired

had acquired year "#", and of which it had not previously disposed, this was aimed chiefly at Egypt and Cyprus. For the same purpose all subject communities, with the exception of the towns with Latin rights and the other free cities, were burdened with ery high rates of taxes and titles. Lastly there was likewise destined for those purchases the produce of the new procureal restnues to be reckoned from "#", and the proceeds of the whole boots not yet legally applied, which regulation had reference to the new sources of taxation opened up by Pompens in the East.

and to the public moneys that might be found in the hands of Pompeius and the heirs of Sulla. For the execution of this measure decemvirs with a special jurisdiction and special imperium were to be nominated, who were to remain five years in office and to surround themselves with 200 subalterns from the equestrian order; but in the election of the decemvirs only those candidates who should personally announce themselves were to be taken into account, and, as in the elections of priests (iii. 409), only seventeen tribes to be fixed by lot out of the thirtyfive were to make the election. It needed no great acuteness to discern that in this decemviral college it was intended to create a power after the model of that of Pompeius, only with somewhat less of a military and more of a democratic hue. The jurisdiction was especially needed for the sake of deciding the Egyptian question, the military power for the sake of arming against Pompeius; the clause, which forbade the choice of an absent person, excluded Pompeius; and the diminution of the tribes entitled to vote as well as the manipulation of the balloting were designed to facilitate the management of the election in accordance with the views of the democracy.

But this attempt totally missed its aim. The multitude, finding it more agreeable to have their corn measured out to them under the shade of Roman porticoes from the public magazines than to cultivate it for themselves in the sweat of their brow, received even the proposal in itself with complete indifference. They soon came also to feel that Pompeius would never acquiesce in such a resolution offensive to him in every respect, and that matters could not stand well with a party which in its painful alarm condescended to offers so extravagant. Under such circumstances it was not difficult for the government to frustrate the proposal; the new consul Cicero seized the opportunity of exhibiting in this case his talent for giving a finishing stroke to the beaten party; even before the tribunes who stood ready exercised their veto, the author himself withdrew his proposal (1 January  $\frac{691}{63}$ ). The democracy had gained nothing but the unpleasant lesson, that the great multitude out of love or fear still continued to adhere to Pompeius, and that every proposal was certain to fail which the public perceived to be directed against him.

Wearied by all this vain agitation and scheming without result, Catilina determined to push the matter to a decision and make an end of it once for all. He took his measures in the course of the summer to open the civil war.

(Fiesole), a very strong town situated in Etruria-which swarmed with the impoverished and conspirators-and fifteen years before the centre of the rising of Lepidus, was again selected as the head quarters of the insurrection. Thither were despatched the consignments of money, for which the ladies of quality in the capital implicated in the conspiracy furnished the means, there arms and soldiers were collected, and there an old Sullan captain. Gatus Manhus, as brave and as free from scruples of conscience as was ever any soldier of fortune, took temporarily the chief command Similar though less extensive warlike preparations were made at other points of Italy The Transpadanes were so excited that they seemed only waiting for the signal to strike In the Bruttian country, on the east coast of Italy, in Capua-wherever great bodies of slaves were accumulated-a second slave insurrection like that of Spartacus seemed on the eve of arising Even in the capital there was something brewing, those who saw the haughty bearing with which the summoned debtors appeared before the urban practor, could not but remember the scenes which had preceded the murder of Aselho (m 244) The capitalists were in unutterable anxiety, it seemed needful to enforce the prohibition of the export of gold and silver, and to place the principal ports under surveillance The plan of the conspirators was-on occasion of the consular election for "?, for which Catilina had again announced himself-summarily to put to death the consul conducting the election as well as the inconvenient rival can didates, and to carry the election of Catilina at any price, in case of necessity, even to bring armed bands from Faesulae and the other rallying points against the capital, and with their help to crush resistance

Cicero, who was constantly and completely informed by his

hand denounced the con leaders gughtily

hat, if the election for consul show a leader against that, if the election for consul show he great headless party would certainly no longer want a leader against the small party led by wretched heads. But as palpable cvidences of the plot were not before them, nothing farther was to be got from the timid senate, except that it gate its previous sanction in the usual way to the exceptional measures which the magnitrates might deem suitable (zist October). Thus the election battle approached—on this occasion more a battle than an election; for Cicero too had formed for himself an armed hodyguard out of the younger men, more especially of the mercantile order; and it was his armed force that covered and commanded the Campus Martius on the 28th October, the day to which the election had been postponed by the senate. The conspirators were not successful either in killing the consul conducting the election, or in deciding the elections according to their mind.

But meanwhile the civil war had begun. On the 27th October Gaius Manlius had planted at Faesulae the eagle round which the army of the insurrection was to flock-it was one of the Marian eagles from the Cimbrian war-and he had summoned the robbers from the mountains as well as the country people to join him. His proclamations, following the old traditions of the popular party, deemed liberation from the oppressive load of debt and a modification of the procedure in insolvency, which, if the amount of the debt actually exceeded the clear estate, certainly still involved in law the forfeiture of the debtor's freedom. It seemed as though the rabble of the capital, in coming forward as if it were the legitimate successor of the old plebeian farmers and fighting its battles under the glorious eagles of the Cimbrian war, wished to cast a stain not only on the present but on the past of Rome. This rising, however, remained isolated; at the other places of rendezvous the conspiracy did not go beyond the collection of arms and the institution of secret conferences, as resolute leaders were everywhere wanting. This was fortunate for the government; for, although the impending civil war had been for a considerable time openly announced, its own irresolution and the clumsiness of the rusty machinery of administration had not allowed it to make any military preparations whatever. It was only now that the general levy was called out, and superior officers were ordered to the several regions of Italy that each might suppress the insurrection in his own district; while at the same time the gladiatorial slaves were ejected from the capital, and patrols were ordered on account of the apprehension of incendiarism.

Catilina was in a painful position. According to his design there should have been a simultaneous rising in the capital and in Etruria on occasion of the consular elections; the failure of the former and the outbreak of the latter movement endangered his person as well as the whole success of his undertaking. Now that his partisans at Faesulae had once risen in arms against the government, he could no longer remain in the capital; and yet not only did everything depend on his inducing the conspirators departure was placed at the head of the conspirators, resolved or rapidly striking a blow, the conspiracy might still have been on rapidity striking a new, the conspiracy inight still have been successful. But the conspirators were just as incapable and as succession Dut the conspirators were just as meangaint and as cowardly as their opponents, weeks elapsed and the matter

At length the counter mine brought about a decision Lentulus came to no decisive issue in his tedious fashion, which sought to cover negligence in regard to what was immediate and necessary by the projection of large and distant plans, bad entered into relations with the deputies of a Celtic canton, the Allohroges, now present in Rome, had attempted to implicate these—the representatives of a thoroughly disorganised commonwealth and themselves deeply involved in debt—in the conspiracy, and had given them on their departure messages and letters to his confidents The Allobroges left Rome, but were arrested in the night between the 2nd and 3rd December close to the gates by the Roman authorities, and their papers were taken from them It was obvious that the Allohrogian deputies had lent themselves as spies to the Roman government, and had carried on the negotiations only with a view to convey into the hands of the latter the desired evidences against the ringleaders of the conspiracy On the following morning orders were issued with the utmost secrecy by Cicero for the arrest of the most dangerous leaders of the plot, and exe cuted in regard to Lentulus, Cethegus, Gabinus, and Statilius, while some others escaped from sezure by flight The guilt of those arrested as well as of the fugitives was completely evident Immediately after the arrest the letters seared, the seals and handwriting of which the prisoners could not avoid acknowledging, were laid before the senate, and the captives and witnesses were heard, further confirmatory proofs, deposits of arms in the houses of the conspirators, threatening expressions which they had employed, were presently forthcoming, the facts of the conspiric; were fully and validly established, and the most important documents were immediately on the sugges narchist conspiracy was general

ty have made use of the revelademocracy generally and Caesar

in particular, but it was far too thoroughly broken to be able to accomplish this, and to prepare for him the fate which it had formerly prepared for the two Gracchi and Satuminus, in this respect the matter went no farther than good will The multitude of the capital was especially shocked by the incerdiary schemes of the conspirators. The merchants and the whole party of material interests naturally perceived in this war of the debtors against the creditors a struggle for their very existence; in tumultuous excitement their youth crowded, with swords in their hands, round the senate-house and brandished them against the open and secret partisans of Catilina. In fact, the conspiracy was for the moment paralysed; though its ultimate authors perhaps were still at liberty, the whole staff entrusted with its execution were either captured or had fled; the band assembled at Faesulae could not possibly accomplish much, unless supported by an insurrection in the capital.

In a tolerably well-ordered commonwealth the matter would now have been politically at an end, and the military and the tribunals would have undertaken the rest. But in Rome matters had come to such a pitch, that the government was not even in a position to keep a couple of noblemen of note in safe custody. The slaves and freedmen of Lentulus and of the others arrested were stirring; plans, it was alleged, were contrived to liberate them by force from the private houses in which they were detained; there was no lack-thanks to the anarchist doings of recent years—of ringleaders in Rome who contracted at a certain rate for riots and deeds of violence; Catilina, in fine, was informed of what had occurred, and was near enough to attempt a coup de main with his bands. How much of these rumours was true, we cannot tell; but there was ground for apprehension, because, agreeably to the constitution, neither troops nor even a respectable police force were at the command of the government in the capital, and it was in reality left at the mercy of every gang of banditti. The idea was suggested of precluding all possible attempts at liberation by the immediate execution of the prisoners. Constitutionally, this was not possible. According to the ancient and sacred right of appeal, a sentence of death could only be pronounced against the Roman burgess by the whole body of burgesses, and not by any other authority; and, as the courts formed by the body of burgesses had themselves become antiquated, a capital sentence was no longer pronounced at all. Cicero would gladly have rejected the hazardous suggestion; indifferent as in itself the legal question might be to the advocate, he knew well how very useful it is to an advocate to be called liberal, and he showed little desire to separate himself for ever from the democratic party by shedding this blood. But those around him, and particularly his aristocratic wife, urged him to crown his services to his country by this bold step, the consul like all cowards m his anxiously endeavo decide and vet trembling distress convoked ed had I to an death of the Rule up at another even less sistent? Caesar made every exertion to save the pa ıA his speech, full of covert threats as to the future inevitable ms speech, tun of covere arreads as to the future meritage, vengeance of the democracy, made the deepest impression vengeance of the democracy, made the deepest impression.

Although all the consulars and the great majority of the senate had already declared for the execution, most of them, with had already declared for the execution, most of them, what Cicero at their head, seemed now once more inclined to keep with n the limits of the law But when Cato in pettifogging

lot, and pointed to the prepara

ers by a street not, he succeeded ers by a street riot, he succeeded tions for not a waverers into a fresh alarm, and in securing a in throwing the waverers into a fresh alarm, and in securing a majority for the immediate execution of the transgressors

The execution of the decree naturally devolved on the consul, who had called it forth Late on the evening of the 5th of Pecember the prisoners were brought from their previous parters, and conducted across the market place still densely puarters, and conducted across the market price sum content or rowded by men to the prison in which criminals condemned to rowaged by men to the proof in which criminals contamined to leath were wont to be kept. It was a subterfanean vault, twelve feet deep, at the foot of the Capitol, which formerly had served as a well house The consul himself conducted Lentillus, and practors the others, all attended by strong guards, but the attempt at rescue, which had been expected, did not take place No one knew whether the prisoners were being cooveyed to a secure place of custody or to the scene of execution. At the door of the prison they were handed over to the triumvirs who conducted the executions, and were strangled in the subterranean sault by torchlight The consul had waited before the door till the executions were accomplished, and then with his loud well known voice proclaimed over the Forum to the multi-tude waiting in silence, They are dead, Till far on in the night the crowds moved through the streets and exultingly saluted the consul, to whom they believed that they owed the security of their houses and their property The senate ordered public festivals of gratifued, and the first men of the nobility, Marcus Cato and Quintus Catulus, saluted the author of the sentence of death with the name—now heard for the first time—of a "father of his fatherland."

But it was a dreadful deed, and all the more dreadful that it appeared to a whole people great and commendable. Never perhaps has a commonwealth more lamentably declared itself bankrupt than did Rome through this resolution—adopted in cold blood by the majority of the government and approved by public opinion—to put to death in all haste a few political prisoners, who were no doubt culpable according to the laws, but had not forfeited life; because, forsooth, the security of the prisons was not to be trusted, and there was no sufficient police. It was the humorous trait seldom wanting to an historical tragedy that this act of the most brutal tyranny had to be carried out by the most unstable and timid of all Roman statesmen, and that the "first democratic consul" was selected to destroy the palladium of the ancient freedom of the Roman commonwealth, the right of provocatio.

After the conspiracy had been thus stifled in the capital, even before it came to an outbreak, there remained the task of putting an end to the insurrection in Etruria. The army amounting to about 2000 men, which Catilina found on his arrival, had increased nearly fivefold by the numerous recruits who flocked in, and already formed two tolerably full legions, in which however only about a fourth part of the men were sufficiently armed. Catilina had thrown himself with his force into the mountains and avoided a battle with the troops of Antonius. with the view of completing the organisation of his bands and awaiting the outbreak of the insurrection in Rome. But the news of its failure broke up the army of the insurgents; the mass of the less compromised thereupon returned home. The remnant of resolute, or rather desperate, men that were left made an attempt to cut their way through the Apennine passes into Gaul; but when the little band arrived at the foot of the mountains near Pistoria (Pistoja), it found itself caught between two armies. In front of it was the corps of Quintus Metellus, which had come up from Ravenna and Ariminum to occupy the northern slope of the Apennines; behind it was the army of Antonius, who had at length yielded to the urgency of his officers and agreed to a winter campaign. Catilina was wedged in on both sides, and his supplies came to an end; nothing was left but to throw himself on the nearest foe, which was Antonius. In a narrow valley enclosed by rocky mountains the conflict took place between the insurgents and the troops of Antonius, which-in order that he might not be obliged at least personally to perform execution on his former allies-he had under a pretext entrusted for this day to a brave officer who had grown grey under arms, Marcus Petrems The superior strength of the government army was of little account, owing to the nature of the field of battle Both Catilina and Petreius placed their most trusty men in the foremost ranks, quarter was neither given nor received The conflict lasted long, and many brave men fell on both sides, Catilina, who before the beginning of the battle had sent back his horse and those of all his officers, showed on this day that nature had destined him for no ordinary things, and that he knew at once how to command as a general and how to fight as a soldier At length Petreius with his guard broke the centre of the enemy, and, after having overthrown this, attacked the two wings from within This decided the victory. The corpses of the Catilmarians—there were counted 3000 of The corpses of the Cathinachans—and file, the ground where them—covered, as it were in rank and file, the ground where the all sought allu zou ...

account of this victory stamped by the science and new thanksgiving festivals showed that the government and the governed were beginning to become accustomed to civil war

The anarchist plot had thus been suppressed in the capital and in Italy with bloody violence, people were reminded of it merely by the criminal processes which in the Etruscan country towns and in the capital thinned the ranks of those affiliated to the beaten party, and by the large accessions to the robber-bands of Italy—one of which, for instance, formed out of the remains of the armies of Spartacus and Catilina, was destroyed by a military force in \*\*\* in the territory of Thurn But it is important to keep in view that the blow fell by no means merely on the anarchists proper, who had conspired to set the capital on fire and had fought at Pistoria, but on the whole democratic party That this party, and in particular Crassus and Corsas, had a hand in the game on the present occasion as well as in the - ress may be regarded-not in a juristic, but in an histori only be urged by partisan sophistry as any valid proof of his participation in the plans of Catilina. But a series of other facts is of more weight. According to express and irrefragable testimonies it was especially Crassus and Caesar that supported the candidature of Catilina for the consulship. When Caesar in  $\frac{690}{64}$  brought the executioners of Sulla before the commission for murder (p. 151) he allowed the rest to be condemned, but the most guilty and infamous of all, Catilina, to be acquitted. In the revelations of the 3rd of December, it is true, Cicero did not include among the names of the conspirators of whom he had information those of the two influential men; but it is notorious that the informers denounced not merely those against whom subsequently investigation was directed, but "many innocent" persons besides, whom the consul Cicero thought proper to erase from the list; and in later years, when he had no reason to disguise the truth, he expressly named Caesar among the accomplices. An indirect but very intelligible inculpation is implied also in the circumstance, that of the four persons arrested on the 3rd of December the two least dangerous, Statilius and Gabinius, were handed over to be guarded by the senators Caesar and Crassus; it was manifestly intended that these should either, if they allowed them to escape, be compromised in the view of public opinion as accessories, or, if they really detained them, be compromised in the view of their fellow-conspirators as renegades.

The following scene which occurred in the senate shows significantly how matters stood. Immediately after the arrest of Lentulus and his comrades, a messenger despatched by the conspirators in the capital to Catilina was seized by the agents of the government, and, after having been assured of impunity, was induced to make a comprehensive confession in a full meeting of the senate. But when he came to the critical portions of his confession and in particular named Crassus as having commissioned him, he was interrupted by the senators, and on the suggestion of Cicero it was resolved to cancel the whole statement without further inquiry, and to imprison its author notwithstanding the amnesty assured to him, until such time as he should have not merely retracted the statement, but have also confessed who had instigated him to give such false testimony. Here it is abundantly clear, not merely that that man had a very accurate knowledge of the state of matters who, when summoned to make an attack upon Crassus, replied that he had no desire to provoke the bull of the herd, but also that the majority of the senate with Cicero at their head were agreed in not permitting the revelations to go beyond a certain limit The public was not so nice, the young men, who had taken up arms to ward off the incendiaries, were exasperated against no one so much as against Caesar, on the 5th of December, when he left the senate, they pointed their swords at his breast, and even now he narrowly escaped with his life on the same spot where the fatal blow fell on him seventeen years afterwards, he did not again for a considerable time enter the senate house Any one who impartially considers the course of the conspiracy will not be able to resist the suspicion that during all this time Catilina was backed by more powerful men, who-relying on the want of a legally complete chain of evidence and on the lukewarmness and cowardice of the majority of the senate, which was but half initiated and greedily caught at any pretext for maction-knew how to hinder any serious interference with the conspiracy on the part of the authorities, to procure free departure for the chief of the insurgents, and even so to manage the declaration of war and the sending of troops against the insurrection that it was almost equivalent to the sending of an auxiliary army While the course of the events themselves thus testifies that the threads of the Catilinarian plot reached far higher than Lentulus and Catilina, it deserves also to be noticed that at a much later period, when Caesar had got to the head of the state, he was in the closest alliance with the only Catilinarian still surviving, l'ublius Sittius the leader of the Mauretanian free bands, and that he modified the lan of debt quite in the sense that the proclamations of Munlius demanded

All these pieces of evidence speak clearly enough, but, even were it not so, the desperate position of the democracy in presence of the military power—which since the Galtino-Manilian laws assumed alongside of it an attitude more threatening than ever—renders it almost a certainty that, as usually happens in such cases, it sought a last resource in secret plots and in alliance with anarchy. The circumstances were very similar to those of the Cunnan times. While in the Fast Pompeius occupied a position nearly such as Sulla then did, Crassus and Caesar sought to raise a counter power in Italy like that which Manus and Cunna had possessed, with the view of employing it if possible better than they had done. The way to this result lay once more through terrors—and anarchy, and to pase that way Cathina was certainly the fitting man

Naturally the more reputable leaders of the democracy kept themselves as far as possible in the background, and left to their unclean associates the execution of the unclean work, the political results of which they hoped afterwards to appropriate. Still more naturally, when the enterprise had failed, the partners of higher position applied every effort to conceal their participation in it. And at a later period, when the former conspirator had himself become the target of political plots, the veil was for that very reason drawn only the more closely over those darker years in the life of the great man, and even special apologies for him were written with that very object.<sup>1</sup>

For five years Pompeius was in the East at the head of his armies and fleets; for five years the democracy at home conspired to overthrow him. The result was discouraging. With unspeakable exertions they had not merely attained nothing, but had suffered morally as well as materially enormous loss. Even the coalition of 6.83 was probably regarded by democrats of pure water as a scandal, although the democracy at that time only coalesced with two distinguished men of the opposite party and bound these to its programme. But now the democratic party had made common cause with a band of murderers and bankrupts, who were almost all likewise deserters from the camp of the aristocracy; and had at least for the time being accepted their programme, that is to say, the terrorism of Cinna. The party of material interests, one of the chief elements of the coalition of 683, was thereby alienated from the democracy, and driven into the arms of the Optimates in the first instance, or of any power at all which would and could give protection against anarchy. Even the multitude of the capital, who, although having no objection to a street-riot, found it inconvenient to have their houses set on fire over their heads, were in some measure alarmed. It is remarkable that in this very year  $\binom{691}{63}$

I Such an apology is the Catilina of Sallust, which was published by the author, a notorious Caesarian, after the year  $\frac{708}{40}$ , either under the monarchy of Caesar or more probably under the triumvirate of his heirs; evidently as a treatise with a political drift, which endeavours to bring into credit the democratic party—on which in fact the Roman monarchy was based—and to clear Caesar's memory from the blackest stain that rested on it; and with the collateral object of whitewashing as much as possible the uncle of the triumvir Marcus Antonius. The Jugurtha of the same author is in an exactly similar way designed partly to expose the pitifulness of the oligarchic government, partly to glorify the Coryphaeus of the democracy, Gaius Marius. The circumstance that the adroit author keeps the apologetic and inculpatory character of these writings of his in the background, proves, not that they are not partisan treatises, but that they are good ones.

the full restoration of the Semproman corn largesses took place, and was effected by the senate on the proposal of Cato The league of the democratic leaders with anarchy had obviously created a breach between the former and the burgesses of the city, and the oligarchy sought, not without at least momentary success, to enlarge the chasm and to draw over the masses to their side Lastly, Gnaeus Pompeius had been partly warned partly exasperated, by all these cabals, after all that had occurred, and after the democracy had itself virtually torn asunder the ties which connected it with Pompeius, it could no longer with propriety make the request-which in the had had a certain amount of reason on its side-that he should not himself destroy with the sword the democratic power which he had raised, and which had raised him

Thus the democracy was disgraced and weakened, but above all it bad become ridiculous through the merciless exposure of its perplexity and weakness. Where the humiliation of the overthrown government and similar matters of little moment were concerned, it was great and potent, but every one of its attempts to attain a real political success had proved a down right failure Its relation to Pompeius was as false as pitiful While it was loading him with panegyries and demonstrations of homage, it was concocting against him one intrigue after another, and one after another, like soap bubbles, they burst of themselves The general of the East and of the seas, far from standing on his defence against them, appeared not even to observe all the

the democracy being himself a miserably failed, if the anarchist section had at least displayed some energy, the pure democracy, while knowing doubtless how I aliam prenente to hire conspirat

them or to die

strengthened by the democracy -

able-identity of its interests and those of Pompeius, had been enabled to suppress this attempt at revolution and thereby to achieve yet a last victory over the democracy king Mithradates bad died, Asia Minor and Syria were regulated, and the return of Pompeius to Italy might be every moment expected The decision was not far distant, but was there in fact still room to speak of a decision between the general, who returned more famous and mightier than ever, and the democracy humbled beyond parallel and utterly powerless? Crassus prepared to embark his family and his gold and to seek an asylum somewhere in the East; and even so elastic and so energetic a nature as that of Caesar seemed on the point of giving up the game as lost. In this year ( ${}^{6}_{6}{}^{1}_{3}$ ) occurred his candidature for the place of pontifex maximus (p. 151); when he left his house on the morning of the election, he declared that, if he should fail in this also, he would never again cross its threshold.

CHAPTER VI

RETIREMENT OF POMPEIUS AND COALITION OF THE PRETENDER

WHEN Pompeius, after having transacted the affairs committee to his charge, again turned his eyes towards home, he found fo the second time the diadem at his feet. For long the develop ment of the Roman commonwealth had been tending toward such a catastrophe; it was evident to every unbiassed observer and had been remarked a thousand times, that, if the rule of the aristocracyshould be brought to an end, monarchy was inevitable The senate had now been overthrown at once by the civil democratic opposition and by the military power; the only question remaining was to settle the persons, names, and forms for the new order of things; and these were already clearly enough indicated in the partly democratic, partly military elements of the revolution. The events of the last five years had set, as it were, the final seal on this impending transformation of the commonwealth. In the newly-erected Asiatic provinces, which gave regal honours to their organiser as the successor of Alexander the Great, and received even his favourite freedmen like princes, Pompeius had laid the foundations of his dominion, and found at once the treasures, the army, and the halo of glory which s ale Doman state required. The anarchist government, was an interpretable to be maintained. So the ruler had arisen in the mass, in the had been erected in Italy; to all appearance the year "y" was the last of the republic, the first of monarchy.

This goal, it is true, was not to be reached without a struggle.

The constitution, which had endured for five hundred years, and under which the insignificant town on the Tiber had risen to unprecedented greatness and glory, had sunk its roots into the soil to a depth beyond human ken, and no one could at all calculate to what extent the attempt to overthrow it would penetrate and convulse civil society. Several rivals had been outrun by Pompeius in the race towards the great goal, but had not been wholly set aside. It was not altogether impossible that all these elements might combine to overthrow the new holder of power, and that Pompeius might find Quintus Catulus and Marcus Cato united in opposition to him with Marcus Crassus, Gaius Caesar, and Titus Labienus. But the inevitable and undoubtedly serious struggle could not well be undertaken under circumstances more favourable. It was in a high degree probable that, under the fresh impression of the Catilinarian revolt, a rule which promised order and security, although at the price of freedom, would receive the submission of the whole middle party—embracing especially the merchants who concerned themselves only about their material interests, but including also a great part of the aristocracy, which, disorganised in itself and politically hopeless, had to rest content with securing for itself riches, rank, and influence by a timely compromise with the prince; perhaps even a portion of the democracy, so sorely smitten by the recent blows, might submit to hope for the realisation of a portion of its demands from a military chief raised to power by itself. But, whatever might be the feeling of parties, of what importance, in the first instance at least, were the parties in Italy at all in presence of Pompeius and his victorious army? Twenty years previously Sulla, after having concluded a temporary peace with Mithradates, had with his five legions been able to carry a restoration running counter to the natural development of things in the face of the whole liberal party which had been arming en masse for years, from the moderate aristocrats and the liberal mercantile class down to the anarchists. of Pompeius was far less difficult. He returned, after having fully and conscientiously performed his different functions by sea and land. He might expect to encounter no other serious opposition save that of the various extreme parties, each of which by itself could do nothing, and which even when leagued together were still nothing more than a coalition of factions that remained vehemently hostile to each other and were inwardly at thorough variance. Completely unarmed, they were without a military force and without a head, without organisation in Italy, without support in the provinces, above all, without a general; there was in their ranks hardly a soldier—to say nothing of an officer—of note, who could have ventured to call forth the burgesses to a conflict with Pompeus The circumstance might further be taken into account, that the volcano of revolution, which had been now incessantly blazing for seventy years and feeding on its own flame, was visibly burning out and verging of itself to extinction I twas very doubtful whether the attempt to aim the Italians for party interests would now succeed as it had succeeded with Cinna and Carbo If Pompeus exerted himself, how could be fail to effect a revolution of the state, which was challed out by a certain necessity of nature in the organic development of the Roman commonwealth? Pompeius had seized the right moment when he undertook his mission to the East, he seemed desirous to go forward In the autumn of 22. Ountus Metellus Nenos arrived from the camp of Pompeius in the capital, and came forward as a candidate for the inbuneship, with the express design of employing that position to procure for Pompeius the consulship for the year 623 and more immediately, by special decree of the people, the conduct of the war against Catilina The excitement in Rome was great It was not to be doubted that Nepos was acting under the direct or indirect orders of Pompeius, the desire of Pompeius to appear in Italy as general at the head of his Asiatic legions, and to administer simultaneously the supreme military and the supreme civil power there, was con ceived to be a farther step on the way to the throne, and the mission of Nepos a semi official proclamation of the monarchy Everything turned on the attitude which the two great political parties should assume towards these overtures, their future position and the future of the nation depended on this But the reception which Nepos met with was itself in its turn determined by the then existing relation of the parties to Pompenus, which was of a very peculiar kind Pompenis had gone to the East as general of the democracy He had reason enough to be discontented with Caesar and his adherents, but no open rupture had taken place It is probable that Pompeius, who was at a great distance and occupied with other things, and who besides was wholly destitute of the gift of political divination, by no means saw through, at least at that time, the extent and mutual connection of the democratic intrigues contrived against him, perhaps even in his haughty and shortsighted manner he had a certain pride in ignoring these underground proceedings Then there came the fact, which with a character of Pompeius' sort had much weight, that the democracy never lost sight of outward respect for the great man, and even now  $\binom{691}{63}$  spontaneously (as was his wish) it had granted to him by a special decree of the people unprecedented honours and decorations (p. 138). But, even if all this had not been the case, it lay in Pompeius' own well-understood interest to continue his adherence, at least outwardly, to the popular party; democracy and monarchy stand so closely related that Pompeius, in aspiring to the crown, could scarcely do otherwise than call himself, as hitherto, the champion of popular rights. While personal and political reasons, therefore, co-operated to keep Pompeius and the leaders of the democracy, despite of all that had taken place, in their previous connection, nothing was done on the opposite side to fill up the chasm which separated him since his desertion to the camp of the democracy from his Sullan partisans. His personal quarrel with Metellus and Lucullus transferred itself to their extensive and influential coteries. A paltry opposition of the senate—but, to a character of so paltry a mould, all the more exasperating by reason of its very paltriness-had attended him through his whole career as a general. He felt it keenly, that the senate had not taken the smallest step to honour the extraordinary man according to his desert, that is, by extraordinary means. Lastly, it is not to be forgotten, that the aristocracy was just then intoxicated by its recent victory and the democracy deeply humbled, and that the aristocracy was led by the pedantically stiff and half-witless Cato, and the democracy by the most supple master of intrigue, Caesar.

176

Such was the state of parties amidst which the emissary sent forth by Pompeius appeared. The aristocracy not only regarded the proposals which he announced in favour of Pompeius as a declaration of war against the existing constitution, but treated them openly as such, and took not the slightest pains to conceal their alarm and their indignation. With the express design of combating these proposals, Marcus Cato had himself elected as tribune of the people along with Nepos, and abruptly repelled the repeated attempts of Pompeius to approach him personally. Nepos naturally after this found himself under no inducement to spare the aristocracy, but attached himself the more readily to the democrats, when these, pliant as ever, submitted to what was inevitable and chose freely to concede the office of general in Italy as well as the consulate rather than let the concession be wrung from them by force of arms. The cordial understanding soon showed itself. Nepos publicly accepted (December  $\frac{691}{63}$ ) the democratic view of the executions recently decreed by the majority of the senate, as unconstitutional judicial murders; and that his lord and master looked on them in no other light, was shown by his significant silence respecting the voluminous vindication of them which Cicero had sent to him. On the other hand, the first act with which Caesar heran his praetorship was to call Quintus Catulus to account for the moneys alleged to have been embezzled by him in the rebuilding of the Capitoline temple, and to transfer the completion of the temple to Pompeius. This was a masterstroke. Catulus had already been building at the temple for fifteen years, and seemed very much disposed to die as he had lived superintendent of the Capitoline buildings; an attack on this abuse of a public commission—an abuse covered only by the reputation of the noble commissioner-was in reality entirely justified and in a high degree popular. But when the prospect was simultaneously opened up to Pompeius of being allowed to delete the name of Catulus and engrave his own on this proudest spot of the proudest city of the globe, there was offered to him the very thing which most of all delighted him and did no harm to the democracy-abundant but empty honour; while at the same time the aristocracy, which could not possibly allow its best man to fall, was brought into the most annoving collision with Pompeius.

Meanwhile Nepos had brought his proposals concerning Pompeius before the burgesses. On the day of voting Cato and his friend and colleague, Quintus Minucius, interposed their veto. When Nepos did not regard this and continued the reading out, a formal conflict took place: Cato and Minucius threw themselves on their colleague and forced him to stop; an armed band liberated him, and drove the aristocratic section from the Forum; but Cato and Minucius returned, now supported likewise by armed bands, and ultimately maintained the field of battle for the government. Encouraged by this victory of their bands over those of their antagonist, the senate suspended the tribune Nepos as well as the practor Caesar, who had vigorously supported him in the bringing in of the law, from their offices; their deposition, which was proposed in the senate, was prevented by Cato, more, doubtless, because it was unconstitutional than because it was injudicious. Caesar did not regard the decree, and continued his official functions till the senate used violence against him. As soon as this was known, the multitude appeared before his house and placed itself at his disposal; it depended solely on him whether the struggle in the streets should be begun, or whether at least the proposals made by Metellus should now be resumed and the military command in Italy desired by Pompeius should be procured for him; but this was not in Caesar's interest, and so he induced the crowds to disperse, whereupon the senate recalled the penalty decreed against him. Nepos himself had, immediately after his suspension, left the city and embarked for Asia, in order to report to Pompeius the result of his mission.

Pompeius had every reason to be content with the turn which things had taken. The way to the throne now lay necessarily through civil war; and he owed it to Cato's incorrigible perversity that he could begin this war with good reason. the illegal condemnation of the adherents of Catalina, after the unparalleled acts of violence against the tribune of the people Metellus, Pompeius might wage war at once as defender of the two palladia of Roman public freedom—the right of appeal and the inviolability of the tribunate of the people-against the aristocracy, and as champion of the party of order against the Catilinarian band. It seemed almost impossible that Pompeius should neglect this opportunity and with his eyes open put himself a second time into the painful position, in which the dismissal of his army in 694 had placed him, and from which only the Gabinian law had released him. But near as seemed the opportunity of placing the white chaplet around his brow. and much as his own soul longed after it, when the question of action presented itself, his heart and his hand once more failed him. This man, altogether ordinary in every respect excepting only his pretensions, would doubtless gladly have placed himself above the law, if only he could have done so without forsaking legal ground. His very lingering in Asia betrayed a misgiving of this sort. He might, had he wished, have very well arrived in January 602 with his fleet and army at the port of Brundisium, and have received Nepos there. tarrying the whole winter of  $\frac{691}{63}$   $\frac{1}{62}$  in Asia had proximately the injurious consequence, that the aristocracy, which of course accelerated the campaign against Catilina as it best could, had meanwhile got rid of his bands, and had thus set aside the most feasible pretext for keeping together the Asiatic legions in Italy. For a man of Pompeius' character, who for want of faith in himself and in his star timidly clung in public life to formal right, and with whom the pretext was nearly of as much importance as the motive, this circumstance was of serious weight. He probably said to himself, moreover, that, even if he dismissed his army, he did not let it wholly out of his hand, but could in case of need raise a force ready for battle sooner at any rate than any other party chief, that the democracy was waiting in submissive attitude for his signal, and that he could deal with the refractory senate even without soldiers, and other similar considerations that suggested themselves, in which there was exactly enough of truth to make them appear plausible to one who wished to deceive himself The very peculiar temperament of Pompeius naturally turned once more the scale was one of those men who are capable it may be of a crime, but not of insubordination, in a good as in a bad sense, he was thoroughly a soldier Men of mark respect the law as a moral necessity, ordinary men as a traditional every day rule, for this very reason military discipline, in which more than anywhere else law takes the form of habit, binds every man not entirely self reliant as with a magic spell. It has often been observed that the soldier, even where he has determined to refuse obedience to his commander, involuntarily when that obedience is demanded resumes his place in the ranks. It was this feeling that made Lafay ette and Dumouriez hesitate at the last moment before the breach of faith and fail in their design, and to this too Pompeius succumbed

In the autumn of **P Pompeius embarked for Italy While in the capital all was preparation for receiving the new monarch, news came that Pompeius, when barely landed at Brundsium, had broken up his legions and with a small escort had entered on his journey to the capital If it is a piece of good fortune to gain a crown without trouble, fortune never did more for mortal than it did for Pompeius, but on those who lack courage

the gods lavish every favour and every gift in vain

The parties breathed freely Pompeius had abdicated a second time, his already vanquished competitors might once more begin the race—in which doubtless the strangest thing was, that Pompeius was again a rival runner. In January *? he with all. The anurchists saw in him an adversary, the democrats an inconvenient friend, Marcus Crassus a rival, the wealthy class an untrustworthy protector, the anstocracy a declared foe <sup>2</sup>

&lt;sup>1</sup> The impression of the first address which Pompelus made to the burgesses after his return is thus described by Cleero (ad dt | rq), transcento Pompe non sucunda misers (the rabble, easier improbis (the democratic personne).

He was still indeed the most powerful man in the state; his military adherents scattered throughout Italy, his influence in the provinces, particularly those of the East, his military fame, his enormous riches gave him a weight which no other possessed; but instead of the enthusiastic reception on which he had counted, the reception which he met with was more than cool, and still cooler was the treatment given to the demands which he presented. He requested for himself, as he had already caused to be announced by Nepos, a second consulship; demanding also, of course, a confirmation of the arrangements made by him in the East and a fulfilment of the promise which he had given to his soldiers to furnish them with lands. Against these demands a systematic opposition arose in the senate, the chief elements of which were furnished by the personal exasperation of Lucullus and Metellus Creticus, the old resentment of Crassus, and the conscientious folly of Cato. The desired second consulship was at once and bluntly refused. The very first request which the returning general addressed to the senate, that the election of the consuls for  $^{693}_{1}$  might be put off till after his entry into the capital, had been rejected; much less was there any likelihood of obtaining from the senate the necessary dispensation from the law of Sulla as to re-election (iii. 342). As to the arrangements which he had made in the Eastern provinces, Pompeius naturally asked their confirmation as a whole; Lucullus carried a proposal that every ordinance should be separately discussed and voted upon, which opened the door for endless annoyances and a multitude of defeats in detail. The promise of a grant of land to the soldiers of the Asiatic army was ratified indeed in general by the senate, but was at the same time extended to the Cretan legions of Metellus; and -what was worse-it was not executed, because the public chest was empty and the senate was not disposed to meddle with the domains for this purpose. Pompeius, in despair of mastering the persistent and spiteful opposition of the senate. turned to the burgesses. But he understood still less how to conduct his movements on this field. The democratic leaders, although they did not openly oppose him, had no cause at all to make his interests their own, and so kept aloof. Pompeius' own instruments—such as the consuls elected by his influence and partly by his money, Marcus Pupius Piso for 693 and Lucius Afranius for 694—showed themselves unskilful and useless.

crats), beatis (the wealthy) non grata, bonis (the aristocrats) non gravis; itaque frigebat.

When at length the assignation of land for the veterans of Pompeus was submitted to the burgesses by the tribune of the exalted general now sued almost humbly for the favour of the masses, for it was on his instigation that the Italian toils were abolished by a law introduced by the practor Metellus Nepos ("$\footnote{c}\text{o}'\text{o}

Then a new combination offered itself. The leader of the democratic party had actively employed in his own interest the political calim which had immediately followed on the retire ment of the previous holder of power. When Pompeius returned from Asia, Caesar had been little more than what Catilina was—the chief of a political party which had dwindled almost into a club of conspirators, and a bankrupt. But since that event he had, after administering the prevention of $\frac{\psi}{2}$, been mested the reby had found.

to the province from the most oppressive portion of his load of debt. It there I and as I came forward for the following year as a candidate for the consulsing, for the sake of which, as the senate refused him permission to announce himself as a candidate for the consular election in absence, he without hesitation abandoned the honour of the triumph. For years the democracy had striven to raise one of its partisans to the possession of the supreme magistracy, that by this means it might attain a military power of its own. It had long been clear to discerning men of all shades that the strife of parties could not be settled by civil conflict, but only by military power, but the course of the coalition between the democracy and the powerful military chiefs, through which the rule of the senate had been terminated, showed with inexorable clearness that every such alliance ultimately issued in a subordination of the civil under the military elements, and that the popular party, if it would really rule, must not ally itself with generals properly foreign and even hostile to it, but must make generals of its own leaders themselves. The attempts made with this view to carry the election of Catilina as consul, and to gain a military support in Spain or Egypt, had failed; now a possibility presented itself of procuring for their most important man the consulship and the consular province in the usual constitutional way, and of rendering themselves independent of their dubious and dangerous ally Pompeius by the establishment, if we may so speak, of a home power in their own democratic household.

But the more the democracy could not but desire to open up for itself this path, which offered not so much the most favourable as the only prospect of real successes, the more certainly it might reckon on the resolute resistance of its political opponents. Everything depended on whom it found opposed to it in this matter. The aristocracy isolated was not formidable; but it had just been rendered evident in the Catilinarian affair that it could certainly still exert some influence, where it was more or less openly supported by the men of material interests and by the adherents of Pompeius. It had several times frustrated Catilina's candidature for the consulship, and that it would attempt the like against Caesar was sufficiently certain. But, even though Caesar should perhaps be chosen in spite of it, his election alone did not suffice. He needed at least some years of undisturbed working out of Italy, in order to gain a firm military position; and the nobility assuredly would leave no means untried to thwart his plans during this time of preparation. The idea naturally occurred, whether the aristocracy might not be again successfully isolated as in 683-684, and an alliance firmly based on mutual advantage might not be established between the democrats with their ally Crassus on the one side and Pompeius and the great capitalists on the other. Pompeius such a coalition was certainly a political suicide. weight hitherto in the state rested on the fact, that he was the only party-leader who at the same time disposed of legionswhich, though now dissolved, might still in a certain sense be said to be at his disposal. The plan of the democracy was directed to the very object of depriving him of this preponderance, and of placing by his side in their own chief a military rival Never could he consent to this, and least of all personally help to a post of supreme command a man like Caesar, who already as a mere political agitator had given him trouble enough and had just furnished the most brilliant proofs also of military capacity in Spain But on the other hand in con sequence of the cavilling opposition of the senate and the in difference of the multitude to Pompeius and Pompeius' wishes, his position particularly with reference to his old soldiers, had become so painful and so

expect from his character

price of releasing him fro

as to the so-called equestrian party, it was to be found on ever side the power lay, and as a matter of course it would not let itself be long waited for, if it saw Pompeius and the demo cracy combining anew in earnest. It happened moreover, that on account of Cato's severity-otherwise very laudabletowards the lessees of the taxes, the great capitalists were just at this time once more at vehement variance with the senate

So the second coalition was concluded in the summer of " Caesar was assured of the consulship for the following year and a governorship in due course, to Pompeius was promised the ratification of his arrangements made in the East, and an assignation of lands for the soldiers of the Asiatic army, to the equites Caesar likewise promised to pricure for them by means of the burgesses what the senate had refused, Crassus in fine—the inevitable—was allowed at least to join the league, although without obtaining the promise of a definite equivalent for an accession which he could not refuse It was exactly the same elements, and indeed the same persons, who concluded the loom e with one another in the autumn of "1" and in the summer at a of the position of the parties

was nothing but a political is generals at the head of their armies, now the leader of the democracy was himself an Imperator crowned with victory and full of magnificent immary schemes, while his allies were retired generals without any army Then the democracy conquered in questions of principle, and in return for that victory conceded the highest offices of state to its two confederates, now it had become more practical and grasped the supreme civil and military power for itself, while concessions were made to its allies only in subordinate points and, significantly enough, not even the old demand of Pompeius for a second consulship was attended to. Then the democracy sacrificed itself to its allies; now these had to entrust themselves to it. All the circumstances were completely changed, most of all, however, the character of the democracy itself. No doubt it had, ever since it existed at all, contained at its core a monarchic element; but the ideal of a constitution, which floated in more or less clear outline before its best intellects, was always that of a civil commonwealth, a Periclean organisation of the state, in which the power of the prince rested on the fact that he represented the burgesses in the noblest and most accomplished manner, and the most accomplished and noblest part of the burgesses recognised him as the man in whom they thoroughly confided. Caesar too set out with such views; but they were simply ideals, which might have some influence on realities, but could not be directly realised. Neither the simple civil power, as Gaius Gracchus possessed it, nor the arming of the democratic party, such as Cinna though in a very inadequate fashion had attempted, was able to maintain a permanent superiority in the Roman commonwealth; the military machine fighting not for a party but for a general, the rude force of the condottieri—which had first appeared on the stage in the service of the restoration—soon showed itself absolutely superior to all political parties. Caesar could not but acquire a conviction of this amidst the practical workings of party, and accordingly he matured the momentous resolution of making this military machine itself serviceable to his ideals, and of erecting such a commonwealth as he had in his mind by the power of condottieri. With this design he concluded in 683 the league with the generals of the opposite party, which, notwithstanding that they had accepted the democratic programme, yet brought the democracy and Caesar himself to the brink of destruction. With the same design he himself came forward eleven years afterwards as a condottiere. It was done in both cases with a certain naïvetéwith good faith in the possibility of his being able to found a free commonwealth, if not by the swords of others, at any rate by his own. We perceive without difficulty that this faith was fallacious, and that no one takes an evil spirit into his service without becoming himself enslaved to it; but the greatest men are not those who err the least. If we still after so many centuries bow in reverence before what Caesar willed and did. it is not because he desired and gained a crown (to do which is, abstractly, as little of a great thing as the crown itself), but because his mighty ideal—of a free commonwealth under one

ruler-never forsook him, and preserved him even when monarch

from sinking into vulgar royalty.

The election of Caesar as consul for 635 was carried without difficulty by the united parties. The aristocracy had to rest content with giving to him—by means of a bribery, for which the whole order of lords contributed the funds, and which excited surprise even in that period of deepest corruption—a colleague in the person of Marcus Bibulus, whose narrow-minded obstinacy was regarded in their circles as conservative energy and whose good intentions at least were not at fault if the noble lords did not get a fit return for their patriotic expenditure.

As consul Caesar first submitted to discussion the requests of his confederates, among which the assignation of land to the veterans of the Asiatic army was by far the most important. The agrarian law projected for this purpose by Caesar adhered in cameral to the projected set fairly in the project of law which only the Italian domain land, that is to say, substantially, the territory of Capua, and, if this should not suffice, other Italian estates were to be purchased out of the revenue of the new ession rolls: all existing rights thus remained unaffects small. The receivers of land were to be poor burgesses, fathers of at least three children; the dangerous principle, that the rendering of military service gave a claim to landed estate, was not laid down, but, as was reasonable and had been done at all times, the old soldiers as well as the temporary lessees to be ejected were simply recommended to the special consideration of the land-distributors. The execution of the measure was entrusted to a commission of twenty, into which Caesar distinctly declared that he did not wish to be himself elected.

The opposition had a difficult task in resisting this proposal. It could not rationally be denied, that the state finances ought after the erection of the provinces of Pontus and Syria to be in a position to dispense with the moneys from the Campanian leases; that it was unwarrantable to withhold one of the finest districts of Italy, and one peculiarly fitted for small boldings, from private enterprise; and, lastly, that it was as unjust as it was ridiculous, after the extension of the franchise to all Italy, stall to withhold municipal rights from the township of Capus.

The whole proposal bore the stamp of moderation, honesty, and solidity, with which a democratic party-character was very dexterously combined; for in substance it amounted to the re-establishment of the Capuan colony founded in the time of Marius and again done away by Sulla (iii. 306, 335). In form too Caesar observed all possible respect. He laid the project of the agrarian law, as well as the proposal to ratify collectively the ordinances issued by Pompeius in the East, and the petition of the farmers of the taxes for remission of a third of the sums payable by them, in the first instance before the senate for approval, and declared himself ready to receive and discuss proposals for alterations. The corporation had now opportunity of convincing itself how foolishly it had acted in driving Pompeius and the equites into the arms of the adversary by refusing these requests. Perhaps it was the secret sense of this, that drove the high-born lords to the most vehement opposition, which contrasted ill with the calm demeanour of Caesar. The agrarian law was rejected by them nakedly and even without discussion. The decree as to Pompeius' arrangements in Asia found quite as little favour in their eyes. Cato attempted, in accordance with the disreputable custom of Roman parliamentary debate, to kill the proposal regarding the farmers of the taxes by speaking, that is, to prolong his speech up to the legal hour for closing the sitting; when Caesar threatened to have the stubborn man arrested, this proposal too was at length rejected.

Of course all the proposals were now brought before the burgesses. Without deviating far from the truth, Caesar could tell the multitude that the senate had scornfully rejected most rational and most necessary proposals submitted to it in the most respectful form, simply because they came from the democratic consul. When he added that the aristocrats had contrived a plot to procure the rejection of the proposals, and summoned the burgesses, and more especially Pompeius himself and his old soldiers, to stand by him against fraud and force, this too was by no means a mere invention. The aristocracy, with the obstinate weak creature Bibulus and the unbending dogmatical fool Cato at their head, in reality intended to push the matter to open violence. Pompeius, instigated by Caesar to proclaim his position with reference to the pending question, declared bluntly, as was not his wont on other occasions, that if any one should venture to draw the sword, he too would grasp his, and in that case would not leave the shield at home; Crassus expressed himself to the same effect. The old soldiers of proposals of Caesar. On each my when Caesar appeared before the people, his colleague Bibulus instituted the well-know political observations of the weather which interrupted all publications of the weather which interrupted all publications with the people of the weather which interrupted all publications of the weather which interrupted all publications to the tribunication veto was interposed; Caesar contented humse with disregarding it. Bibulus and Cato sprang to the rostre and interposed the usual not; Caesar contented humse with disregarding it.

and took care that outer ..

was for his interest that the political comedy should learners as it was

Notwithstanding all the chicanery and all the blustering of the nobility, the agrarian law, the confirmation of the Asiatic arrangements, and the remission to the lessees of taxes were adopted by the burgesses; and the commission of twenty was a light with Pompeius and Crassus at its head, and installed the blune they were soon to need for matters and hausted itself on affairs that were at bottom indifferent congratulated each other on the heroic courage which they had displayed, the declaration of Bibulus that he would rather die than yield, the peroration which Cato still continued to deliver when in the hands of the lictors, were great patriotic feats; otherwise they resigned themselves to their fate. The consul Bibulus shut himself up for the remainder of the year in his house, while he at the same time intimated by public placard that he had the pious intention of watching the signs of the sky on all the days appropriate for public assemblies during that year. His colleagues once more admired the great man who, as Ennius had said of the old Fabius, "saved the state by wise delay," and they followed bis example, most of them, Cato included, no longer appeared in the senate, but within their four their consul to fret over the fact that the history . . . . . . . astronomy. To the

tracy in general appear--,

tion; and the coalition were naturally very well content that they were left to take their farther steps almost undisturbed.

The most important of these steps was the regulating of the future position of Caesar. Constitutionally it devel this on the senate to fix the functions of the second consular office before the election of the consuls took plays; sive outgly it had, in prospect of the election of Caesar, seltalents an that view for  $\frac{6.9}{6.8}$  two provinces in which the governor should find no other employment than the construction of roads and other such works of utility. Of course the matter could not so remain; it was determined among the confederates, that Caesar should obtain by decree of the people an extraordinary command formed on the model of the Gabinio-Manilian laws. Caesar however had publicly declared that he would introduce no proposal in his own favour; the tribune of the people Publius Vatinius therefore undertook to submit the proposal to the burgesses, who naturally gave their unconditional assent. By this means Caesar obtained the governorship of Cisalpine Gaul and the supreme command of the three legions which were stationed there and were already experienced in border warfare under Lucius Afranius, along with the same rank of propraetor for his adjutants which those of Pompeius had enjoyed; this office was secured to him for five years—a longer period than had ever before been assigned to any general whose appointment was limited to a definite time at all. The Transpadanes, who for years had in hope of the franchise been the clients of the democratic party in Rome and of Caesar in particular (p. 149), formed the main portion of his province. His jurisdiction extended south whar as the Arnus and the Rubico, and included Luca and Ravenna. Subsequently there was added to Caesar's official district the province of Narbo with the one legion stationed there—a resolution adopted by the senate on the proposal of Pompeius, that it might at least not see this command also pass to Caesar by extraordinary decree of the burgesses. What was wished was thus attained. As no troops could constitutionally be stationed in Italy proper (iii. 347), the commander of the legions of northern Italy and Gaul dominated at the same time Italy and Rome for the next five years; and he who was master for five years was master for life. The consulship of Caesar had attained its object. As a matter of course, the new holders of power did not neglect withal to keep the multitude in good humour by games and amusements of all sorts, and they embraced every opportunity of filling their exchequer; in the case of the king of Egypt, for instance, the decree of the people. which recognised him as legitimate ruler (p. 143), was sold to him by the coalition at a high price, and in like manner other nasts and communities accoured charters and provileges on rasts and communities acquired unations and privileges of the consulsing was, at least for the next sufficient beautiful possession. year, entru 45 to safe hands. The public believed at first, that it was destined for Pompeius and Crassus themselves. the regents however preferred to procure the election of two subordinate but trustworthy men of their party-Aulus Gabinius. the best among Compeny' adjutants, and Lucius Piso, who was less important that was Caesar's father in-law-as consuls for 25. Pompeius personally undertook to watch over Italy, where at the head of the commission of twenty he prosecuted the execution of the agrarian law and furnished nearly 20,000 burgesses in great part old soldiers from his army, with land in the territory of Capua Caesar's north Italian legions served

among the regents

onsul, in the maintenance of which Pompeius was as much interested as Caesar, formed a guarantee for the continuance of the breach between Pompeius and the aristocracy-whose heads, and Cato in particular, continued to treat these laws as null-and thereby a guarantee for the subsistence of the coalition Moreover, the personal bonds of connection between its chiefs were drawn closer Caesar had honestly and faithfully kept his word to his confederates without curtailing or cheating them of what he had promised, and in particular had fought to secure the agrarian law proposed in the interest of Pompeius just as if the case had been his own with dexterity and energy, Pompeius was not insensible to upright dealing and good faith, and was kindly disposed towards the man who had helped him to get quit at a blow of the sorry part of a supplicant which he had been playing for three years Frequent and familiar intercourse with a man of the irresistible amiableness of Caesar did what t -terests into an

- if this friendrement which could hardly be misunderstood of the newly established conjoint rule was the marriage of Pompeius with Caesar's only daughter, three-and-twenty years of age. Julia, who had inherited the charm of her father, lived in the happiest domestic relations with her husband, who was nearly twice as old; and the hurgesses longing for rest and order after so many troubles and crises, saw in this nuptial alliance the guarantee of a peaceful aming the perous future.

CHAP. VI.

The more firmly and closely the alliance was strative outset between Pompeius and Caesar, the more hor talents and the cause of the aristocracy. They felt the sworgerwards evinced their head and knew Caesar sufficiently to have peninsula was he would, if necessary, use it without hesite more especially sides," wrote one of them, "we are checkmated: fiarities, nothing through fear of death or of banishment despainable time could every one sighs, no one ventures to speak."

rates could not desire. But though the maje velopment of the cracy was in this desirable frame of mind, they which stretches no lack of Hotspurs among the party. Hard Vediterranean and down the consulship, when some of the most Augustan age has Lucius Domitius and Gaius Memmius, propone land of the Celts the annulling of the Julian laws. This in ind of the Celts was piece of folly, which redounded only to the beave, and the country for, when Caesar now himself insisted thaind did not form a investigate the validity of the laws assailvery reason it is not not but formally recognise their legality. eterogeneous state of be conceived, the regents found in this a which embracing approximation.

example of some of the most notable and which, embracing apie Rhone, on the east ponents, and thereby to assure themselve would adhere to that fit'ing policy of significant been at rest since the first there had been a hope that the clau ver it. In 😘 Gaius which as usual required all the senators ut Aquae Sextiae, and new law on pain of forfeiting their politic its most vehement opponents to banish ar the governor Lucius example of Metellus Numidicus (iii. 198) f his colleagues beyond But these did not show themselves so clerda (Lerida) and on rigid Cato submitted to the oath, and his time by the western A second, far from honourable, attempt t. Aquitani (about 676; the aristocracy with criminal impeachmneral rising of the proalleged plot for the murder of Pompeius. Rhone, perhaps even into exile, was frustrated by the incapac Pompeius had to make the informer, one Vettius, exaggerated ansurgent Gaul to Spain so grossly, and the tribune Vatinius, vebellion gave the terri-scheme, showed his complicity with the lelvii (dep. Gard and that it was found advisable to strangle thrnor Marcius Fontanto let the whole matter drop. On this

```
(67.8-65.0) carried out these arrangements and restored tran-1 3 -- the Vocontu (dep Drôme), and liberating the Roman capital Nation "......
                                       Despair, however, and the financial embarrassment which the participation in the sufferings of the Spanish war (p 30) and generally the official and non-official exactions of the Romans brought upon the Gallic provinces, did not allow them to be tranguil, and in particular the canton of the Allobroges, the most remote from Narbo, was in a perpetual ferment, which was attested by the "pacification" that Gaius Piso undertook there in 63 as well as by the conduct
                              - Dome on occasion of the anarchist
                                                 if the Sertonan
  rum, where Pompeius and J. army (p 34), Tolosa, Vienna, and Geneva were still the most remote Roman townships towards the west and north at the same time the importance of these Gallic possessions for the mother country was continually on the increase. The
                    . - . that of Italy, the favourable nature
  gle ٥f
                                                         * r as for comme.
Britain, the easy intercourse by failu and a country, rapidly gave to southern Gaul an economic importance 1 -14or mesessions, such as those in Spain, centuries; and as the Romans reck at this period sought an there found once more Italian tary emigrants from Italy also the Rhone and the Garonne,
 "The province or vaus, ... aid in a sketch drawn ten years before Caesar's arrival, "is full of merchants; it swarms with Roman burgesses No native of Gaul transacts a piece of business without the intervention of a Roman; every penny that passes from one band to another in Gaul goes through the account books of the Roman burgesses" From the same description it appears that in addition to the colonists of Narbo
 there were Roman farmers and graziers resident in great numbers
```

in Gaul; as to which, however, it must not be overlooked that most of the provincial land possessed by Romans, just like the greater part of the English possessions in the earliest times in America, was in the hands of the high nobility living in Italy, and those farmers and graziers consisted for the most part of their stewards—slaves or freedmen.

It is easy to understand how under such circumstances civilisation and Romanising rapidly spread among the natives. The Celts were not fond of agriculture; but their new masters compelled them to exchange the sword for the plough, and it is very credible that the bitter resistance of the Allobroges was provoked in part by some such ordinances. In earlier times Hellenism had also to a certain degree influenced those regions; the elements of a higher culture, the stimulus to the cultivation of the vine and the olive (iii. 157), to the use of writing,1 and to the coining of money, came to them from Massilia. The Hellenic culture was in this case far from being set aside by the Romans: Massilia gained through them more influence than it lost, and even in the Roman period Greek physicians and rhetoricians were publicly employed in Gallic cantons. But, as may readily be conceived, Hellenism in southern Gaul acquired through the agency of the Romans the same character as in Italy; the distinctively Hellenic civilisation gave place to the Latino-Greek mixed culture, which soon made proselytes here in great numbers. The "Gauls in the breeches," as the inhabitants of southern Gaul were called by way of contrast to the "Gauls in the toga" of northern Italy, were not indeed like the latter already completely Romanised, but they were even now very perceptibly distinguished from the "long-haired Gauls" of the northern regions still unsubdued. The semiculture becoming naturalised among them furnished, doubtless, materials enough for ridicule of their barbarous Latin, and people did not fail to suggest to any one suspected of Celtic descent his "relationship with the breeches," but this bad Latin was yet sufficient to enable even the remote Allobroges to transact business with the Roman authorities, and even to give testimony in the Roman courts without an interpreter.

While the Celtic and Ligurian population of these regions was thus in the course of losing its nationality, and was languishing and pining withal under a political and economic oppression, the intolerable nature of which is sufficiently attested by their hopeless insurrections, the decline of the nature population there went hand in hand with the naturalising of the same higher culture which we find at this period in Italy. Aquie Sextiae and Narbo especially were considerable places, which might probably be named by the side of Beneventum and Capua, and Massilia, the best organised, most free, most capable of self-defence, and most powerful of all the Greek cities dependent on Rome, under its rigidly aristocratic government to which the Roman conservatives probably pointed as the model.

&lt;sup>1</sup> There was found, for instance, at Vaison in the Vocontian canton an inscription in the Celtic language with the ordinary Greek alphabet. It runs thus: σεγομαρος ονιλλονεος τοουτίους ναμανατίο ειωρουβηλησαμισοείν νεμητον. The last word means "holy."

enlarged by the Komans

as Rhegium and Neapons soon... 'taly by the side of Beneventum and Capua Matters were a different aspect when one frontier. The great Celtic nation, which in n its ancient

the Italians freedom It is not time a had already fought with the offsets and advanced posts of this vist stock on the Tiber and on the Po, in the mountains of Castile and Cannthia, and even in the heart of Asia Minor, but it was here that the main stock was first assailed at its very core by their attacks. The Celtic race had on its settlement in central Europe diffused itself chiefly over the nch mer valleys and the pleasant hill country of the present France including the western districts of Germany and Switzerland, and from thence had occupied the southern part of England, perhaps even at this time all Great Britain and Ireland, 1 it formed here more than anywhere else a broad, geographically compact mass of peoples In spite of the differences in language and manners which naturally were to be found within this wide territory, a lively mutual intercourse, an innate sense of fellowship, seems to have Lnit together the tribes from the Rhone and Garonne to the Rhine and the Thames; whereas, although these doubtless were in a certain measure locally connected with the Celis in transect of a Triglish canton and then to to the Somme below Manus of the conage was also derived from the Belge and originally identical with it.

Spain and in the modern Austria, the mighty mountain walls of the Pyrenees and the Alps on the one hand, and the encroachments of the Romans and the Germans which also operated here on the other, interrupted the intercourse and the intrinsic connection of the cognate peoples far otherwise than the narrow arm of the sea interrupted the relations of the continental and the British Celts. Unhappily we are not permitted to trace stage by stage the history of the internal development of this remarkable people in these its chief seats; we must be content with presenting at least some outline of its historical culture and political condition, as it here meets us in the time of Caesar.

Gaul was, according to the reports of the ancients, comparatively well peopled. Certain statements lead us to infer that in the Belgic districts there were some 200 persons to the square mile—a proportion such as nearly holds at present for Wales and for Livonia—in the Helvetic canton about 245; <sup>1</sup> it is probable that in the districts which were more cultivated than the Belgic and less mountainous than the Helvetian, as among the Bituriges, Arverni, Haedui, the number rose still higher. Agriculture was no doubt practised in Gaul, for even the contemporaries of Caesar were surprised in the region of the Rhine by the custom of manuring with marl, <sup>2</sup> and the primitive Celtic

That, moreover, every such attempt to supply the statistical basis, in which ancient history is especially deficient, by means of calculation must be received with due caution, will be at once apprehended by the intelligent reader, while he will not absolutely reject it on that account reader, while he will not absolutely reject it on that account.

"In the interior of Transalpine Gaul on the Rhine," says Serofa in Varro, De R. R. i. 7, 8, "when I commanded there, I traversed some districts, where neither the vine nor the olive nor the fruit-tree appears, where they manure the fields with white pit-chalk, where they have neither rock nor sea-salt, but make use of the saline ashes of certain burnt wood instead of salt." This description refers probably to the period before Caesar and to the eastern districts of the old province, such as the country of the Allobroges; subsequently Pliny (H. N. xvii. 6, 42 seq.) describes at length the Gallo-Britannie manuring with mart,

The first levy of the Belgic cantons exclusive of the Remi, that is, of the country between the Seine and the Scheldt and castward as far as the vicinity of Rheims and Andernach, from 9000 to 10,000 square miles, is reckoned at about 300,000 men; in accordance with which, if we regard the proportion of the first levy to the whole men capable of bearing arms specified for the Bellovaci as holding good generally, the number of the Belgae capable of bearing arms would amount to 500,000, and the whole population accordingly to at least 2,000,000. The Helvetii with the adjoining peoples numbered before their migration 336,000; if we assume that they were at that time already dislodged from the right bank of the Rhine, their territory may be estimated at nearly 1350 square miles. Whether the serfs are included in this, we can the less determine, as we do not know the form which slavery assumed amongst the Celts: what Caesar relates (i. 4) as to the slaves, clients, and debtors of Orgetorix tells rather in favour of, than against, their being included.

custom of preparing beer (ceresia) from barley is likewise an evidence of the early and wide diffusion of the culture of gram; but it was not held in estimation. Even in the more civilised south it was reckoned not becoming for the free Celts to handle the plough. In far higher estimation among the Celts stood pastoral husbandry, for which the Roman land-holders of this epoch very gladly availed themselves both of the Celtic breed of the control of the

aves skilled in riding and familiar Particularly in the northem

was thoroughly predominant. Brittany was in Caesar's Linke a country poor in corn In the north-east dense forests, attaching themselves to the heart of the Ardennes, stretched almost without interruption from the German Ocean to the Rhine, and on the plains of Flanders and Lorraine, now so fertile, the Menapian and Trevenan shepherd then fed his half wild swine in the impenetrable oak-forest Just as in the valley of the Po the Romans made the production of wool and the culture of corn supersede the Celtic feeding of pigs on acorns, so the rearing of sheep and the agriculture in the plains of the Scheldt and the Maas are traceable to their influence. In Britain even the threshing of corn was not jet usual: and in its more northern districts agriculture was not practised, and the rearing of cattle was the only known mode of turning the soil to account. The culture of the olive and vine, which yielded rich produce to the Massiliots, was not yet prosccuted beyond the Cevennes in the time of Caesar.

The Gauls were from the first disposed to settle in groups; there were open villages everywhere, and the Helvette cantom alone numbered in "F" four hundred of these, besides a multitude of single homesteads. But there were not wanting also walled towns, whose walls of alternate layers surprised the Romans both by their suitableness and by the elegant combination of timber and stones, while, it is true, even in the towns of the Allobroges the buildings were creeted solely of wood. Of such towns the Helveth had twelve and the Suessiones an equal number; whereas in the more northern districts, such as among the Nervii, while there were doubtless also towns, the population during war sought protection in the morasses and forests rather than behind their walls, and beyond the Thames the primitive defence of the wooden abatis altogether took the place of towns and was in war the only place of refuge for men and herds.

<sup>11</sup> The Gallic ozen especially are of good repute in listy, for field labour forsooth; whereas the Liguruan are good for nothing "Vario, De R ii 5, 9] Here, no doubt, Casalpine Gaul is referred to, but the pstread husbandry there doubtless goes back to the Celtie epoch. "Pautra shready mentions the "Gallic ponies" ("Gallic dansies, Ad ii ii 5, 21). "It is not every race that is suited for the business of herdusen, neither the Bastulians not the Turduhans" (both in Andalutia)." are for it, the Celts are the best, especially as respects beasts for riding and Lurdin (warring). "(Vario, De R R ii 10, 4).

In close association with the comparatively considerable development of urban life stands the activity of intercourse by land and by water. Everywhere there were roads and bridges. The river-navigation, which streams like the Rhone, Garonne. Loire, and Seine, of themselves invited, was considerable and lucrative. But far more remarkable was the maritime navigation of the Celts. Not only were the Celts, to all appearance, the nation that first regularly navigated the Atlantic ocean, but we find that the art of building and of managing vessels had attained among them a remarkable development. The navigation of the peoples of the Mediterranean had, as may readily be conceived from the nature of the waters traversed by them, for a comparatively long period adhered to the oar; the war-vessels of the Phoenicians, Hellenes, and Romans were at all times oared galleys, in which the sail was applied only as an oceasional aid to the oar; the trading vessels alone were in the epoch of developed ancient civilisation "sailers" properly so called. But, while the Gauls employed in the channel in Caesar's time, as for long afterwards, a species of portable leathern skiffs, which seem to have been in the main common oared boats, on the west coast of Gaul the Santones, the Pictones, and above all the Veneti sailed in large though elumsily built ships, which were not impelled by oars but were provided with leathern sails and iron anchor-chains; and they employed these not only for their traffic with Britain, but also in naval combat. Here therefore we not only meet for the first time with navigation in the open ocean, but we find that here the sailing vessel first fully took the place of the oared boat—an improvement, it is true, which the declining activity of the old world did not know how to turn to account, and the immeasurable results of which our own epoch of renewed culture is employed in gradually reaping.

With this regular maritime intercourse between the British

&lt;sup>1</sup> We are led to this conclusion by the designation of the trading or "round" as contrasted with the "long" or war vessel, and the similar contrast of the "oared ships" (ἐπίκωποι νῆες) and the "merchantmen" (ὁλκάδες, Dionys. iii. 44); and moreover by the smallness of the crew in the trading vessels, which in the very largest amounted to not more than 200 men (Rhein. Mus. N. F. xi. 625), while in the ordinary galley of three decks there were employed 170 rowers (ii. 36). Comp. Movers, Phoen. ii. 3. 167 seq. ii. 3, 167 seq.

- - hotappa

as the flourishing of that as a was the Celts of Brittany, in particular, that brought the un of the mines of Cornwall from England and carried it by the niver and land routes of Gaul to Narbo and Massilia The statement, that in Caesar's time certain tribes at the mouth of the Rhine subsisted on fish and birds' eggs, may probably refer to the circumstance that marine fishing and the collection of the eggs of sea birds were prosecuted there on an extensive scale we put together and endeavour to fill up the isolated and scanty statements which have reached us regarding the Celtic com merce and intercourse, we come to see why the tolls of the nver and maritime ports play a great part in the budgets of certain cantons, such as those of the Haedun and the Veneti, and why the chief god of the nation was regarded by them as the protector of the roads and of commerce, and at the same time as the inventor of manufactures Accordingly the Celtic industry cannot have been wholly undeveloped, indeed the singular d' tonts of the Celts, and their peculiar skill in imitating any are noticed by Caesar 's not appear to . -e of hnen have risen abou al and and woollen str ily by northern Gaul. * ption,

the Romans
and so far as we know the only one not unfrequently of excellent workmanship and even now the standard of the tember of Gaul, and gold coms, are stall at the he skill at the Celte workers in copper and gota, and a steeports of the ancients well accord, that the Romans learned the art of tuning from the Bitunges and that of silvering from the Alesin-inventions, the first of which was naturally suggested by the traffic in tin, and both of which were probably made in the period of Celtic freedom

Hand in hand with dexterity in the elaboration of the metals went the art of procuring them, which had attained, more especially in the iron mines on the Lone, such a degree of professional skill that the mines played an important part in the steges. The opinion prevalent among the Romans of this period, that Gaul was one of the nichest gold countries in the world, is no doubt refuted by the well-known nature of the soil and by the character of the articles discovered in the Celtic tombs, in which gold appears but sparingly and with far less frequency than in the similar repositories of the true native regions of gold; the idea no doubt had its origin merely from the descriptions which Greek travellers and Roman soldiers, doubtless not without strong exaggeration, gave to their countrymen of the magnificence of the Arvernian kings (iii. 158), and of the treasures of the Tolosan temples (iii. 172). But their stories were not pure fictions. It may well be believed that in and near the rivers which flow from the Alps and the Pyrences gold-washing and searches for gold, which are unprofitable at the present value of labour, were worked with profit and on a considerable scale in ruder times and with a system of slavery; besides, the commercial relations of Gaul may, as is not unfrequently the case with half-civilised peoples, have favoured the accumulation of a dead stock of the precious metals.

The low state of the arts of design is remarkable, and is the more striking by the side of this mechanical skill in handling the metals. The fondness for parti-coloured and brilliant ornaments shows the want of a proper taste, which is sadly confirmed by the Gallic coins with their representations sometimes exceedingly simple, sometimes odd, but always childish, in design, and almost without exception rude beyond parallel in their execution. It is perhaps unexampled that a coinage practised for centuries with a certain technical skill should have essentially limited itself to always imitating two or three Greek dies, and always with increasing deformity. On the other hand the art of poetry was highly valued by the Celts, and intimately blended with the religious and even with the political institutions of the nation; we find religious poetry, as well as that of the court and of the mendicant, flourishing (iii. 158). Natural science and philosophy also found, although subject to the forms and fetters of the theology of the country, a certain amount of attention among the Celts; and Hellenic humanism met with a ready reception wherever and in whatever shape it approached them. The knowledge of writing was general at least among the priests. For the most part in free Gaul the Greek writing was made use of in Caesar's time, as was done among others by the Helvetii; but in its most southern districts even then, in consequence of intercourse with the Romanised Celts, the Latin attained predominance—we meet with it, for instance, on the Arvernian coins of this period.

as the flourishing or mans a

as the Celts of Brittany, in particular, that brought the tin of and carried it by the river

sha The statement, that in Caesai s a subsisted on fish and birds' eggs, may probably refer to the circumstance that marine fishing and the collection of the eggs of sea birds were prosecuted there on an extensive scale When we put together and endeavour to fill up the isolated and scanty statements which have reached us regarding the Celtic com merce and intercourse, we come to see why the tolls of the river and maritime ports play a great part in the budgets of certain cantons, such as those of the Haedus and the Venets, and why the chief god of the nation was regarded by them as the protector of the roads and of commerce, and at the same time as the inventor of manufactures Accordingly the Celtic industry cannot have been wholly undeveloped, indeed the singular dextenty of the Celts, and their peculiar skill in imitating any model and executing any instructions, are noticed by Caesar In most branches, however, their handicraft does not appear to have risen above the ordinary level, the manufacture of linen and woollen stuffs, that subsequently flourished in central and northern Gaul, was demonstrably called into existence only by the Romans The elaboration of metals forms an exception, and so far as we know the only one. The copper implements not unfrequently of excellent workmanship and even now malleable, which are brought to light in the tombs of Gaul and the carefully adjusted Arvernian gold coins, are still at the

the carefully adjusted Arvernian gold come, are still at the present day straining witnesses of the skill of the Celus workers a conner and gold, and with this the reports of the ancients are the art of tuning from the

he Alesini-inventions, the first of which was man, and by the traffic in tin, and both of which were probably made in the period of Celuc freedom

Hand in hand with dextenty in the elaboration of the metals went the art of procuring them, which had attained, more especially in the iron mines on the Lone, such a degree of professional skill that the miners played an important part in the sieges. The opinion prevalent among the Romans of this period, that Gaul was one of the nebest gold countries in the world, is no doubt refuted by the well-known nature of the soil and by the character of the articles discovered in the Celtic tombs, in which gold appears but sparingly and with far less frequency than in the similar repositories of the true native regions of gold; the idea no doubt had its origin merely from the descriptions which Greek travellers and Roman soldiers, doubtless not without strong exaggeration, gave to their countrymen of the magnificence of the Arvernian kings (iii. 158), and of the treasures of the Tolosan temples (iii. 172). their stories were not pure fictions. It may well be believed that in and near the rivers which flow from the Alps and the Pyrenees gold-washing and searches for gold, which are unprofitable at the present value of labour, were worked with profit and on a considerable scale in ruder times and with a system of slavery; besides, the commercial relations of Gaul may, as is not unfrequently the case with half-civilised peoples, have favoured the accumulation of a dead stock of the precious metals.

The low state of the arts of design is remarkable, and is the more striking by the side of this mechanical skill in handling the metals. The fondness for parti-coloured and brilliant ornaments shows the want of a proper taste, which is sadly confirmed by the Gallic coins with their representations sometimes exceedingly simple, sometimes odd, but always childish, in design, and almost without exception rude beyond parallel in their execution. It is perhaps unexampled that a coinage practised for centuries with a certain technical skill should have essentially limited itself to always imitating two or three Greek dies, and always with increasing deformity. On the other hand the art of poetry was highly valued by the Celts, and intimately blended with the religious and even with the political institutions of the nation; we find religious poetry, as well as that of the court and of the mendicant, flourishing (iii. 158). Natural science and philosophy also found, although subject to the forms and fetters of the theology of the country, a certain amount of attention among the Celts; and Hellenic humanism met with a ready reception wherever and in whatever shape it approached them. The knowledge of writing was general at least among the priests. For the most part in free Gaul the Greek writing was made use of in Caesar's time, as was done among others by the Helvetii; but in its most southern districts even then, in consequence of intercourse with the Romanised Celts, the Latin attained predominance—we meet with it, for instance, on the Arv coins of this period.

The political development of the Celtic nation also presents very remarkable phenomena. The constitution of the state was based in this case, as everywhere, on the clan-canton, with its prince, its council of the elders, and its community of freemen capable of bearing arms; but the peculiarity in this case was that it never got beyond this cantonal constitution. Among the Greeks and Romans the canton was very early superseded tenow durgesses a new trigwan, there repulativ alose in uns way a new state connected with the mother-community only by the ties of piety or at most of chentship. Among the Celts on the other hand the ' burgess body " continued at all times to be the clan, prince and council presided over the canton and not over any town, and the general diet of the canton formed the authority of last resort in the state The town had, as in the East, merely mercantile and strategic, not political importance, for which reason the Galic townships, even when walled and very con siderable such as Vienna and Genava, were in the view of the Greeks and Romans merely villages In the time of Caesar the original clan constitution still subsisted substantially unaltered among the insular Celts and in the northern cantons of the mainland, the general assembly held the supreme authority, the prince was in essential questions bound by its decrees, the common council was numerous-it numbered in certain clans aix hundred members-but does not appear to have had more importance than the senate under the Roman kings In the more stirring southern portion of the land, again, one or two generations before Caesar-the children of the last kings were still living in his time-there had occurred, at least among the larger clans, the Arverm, Haedun, Sequani, Helvetn, a revolution which set aside the royal dominion and gave the power into the hands of the nobility

It is simply the reverse side of the total want of urban common-

nderates was to

all appearance a high hobility, for the most part perhaps the members of the royal or formerly royal families, as indeed it is remarkable that the heads of the opposite parties in the same clan very frequently belong to the same house. These great families combined in their hands financial, warlike, and political atermiency. They monopolised the leaves of the profitable fight of the state. They compolied the common freemen, who new opposed by the load of debt, to become from them, and to surrender their free lim fir tide facts as debtors, then de face is bindinen. They developed the system of retainer, that is, the providers of the n bility to surround themselves with a tivales of like I in antel corrects, the aminot as they were effective and thereby to form a state within the state; and, I think the reposit of the retrope of their own, they defied the level with ratio and the common levy and practically broke up the e-men awe little. If in a clan, which numbered about there may expulsit of army a small mable could appear at the whit with regres retainer, not rock many the bouchien and the delition, it is clear that this an one has an independent dynast Wather this, a horse or of his claim. More ver, the leading families of the different class were closely a precied one through inter-marriage, and opened treaties formed virtually a compact becar, in the ther of which the ringle clan was powerless,

This general the word must have been in one as early as the sixth springer of the log for lamins is Are ly as your to booth it, and it exaled have rejeted the Italians at no solly a per, of from that quarter. It is not needly Celtic, however, but also becomen, the top of our " And," as indeed the telaperecyclem itself use nome, to the beits and the beginner. It would be af great historical they whater too assertant whether the word-and therefore the thing-Same to the Lefts to us the Generalis, or to the German from the Celts. If, as is no pilly any possible world is enginally German and primarily pleased the respect standing in tattle " against the book " lands spainst. kal—back) of his marter, this is not whelly irres neilable with the impulsity early conserved of this wild among the Celts. According to all analysy the right to keep and who that we dellar proburel, cannot have belonged to the Celtie a balty from the outers, but must only have diveleped fisself gra-inally in antagenism to the older monarchy and to the equality of the free commons. If thus the system of and act among the Celts was not see ancient and national, but a comparatively recent justitution, it is-to him; to the relation which had subsisted for conturies between the Celts and Germans, and which is to be explained further on mot merely possible but even probable that the Celts, in Italy as in Gaul, employed Germans chicily as those bired servants at arms. The "Swiss guard" would therefore in that case be some thousands of years older than people suppose. Should the term by which the Romans, perhaps after the example of the Celts, designate the Germans as a nation—the name Germani—be really of Celtic origin (il. 72), this obviously accords very well with that hypothesis. No doubt these assumptions must necessarily give way, should the word ambachus be explained in a satisfactory way from a Celtic root; as in fact Zenss (Gramm. p. 761), though doubtfully, traces it to amb:=around and aig=agere, viz. persons moving round or moved round, and so attendants, servants. The circumstance that the word occurs also as a Celtic proper name (Zeuss, p. 89), and is perhaps preserved in the Cambrian amaeth=peasant, labourer (Zeuss, p. 179), cannot decide the point either way.

The political development of the Celtic nation also presents very remarkable phenomena. The constitution of the state was based in this case, as everywhere, on the clan-canton, with its prince, its council of the elders, and its community of freemen capable of bearing arms, but the peculiarity in this case was that it never got beyond this cantonial constitution. Among the Greeks and Romans the canton was very early superseded by the ringwall as the basis of political unity, where two cantons

a new state connected with the mother community only by the ties of piety or at most of chentship. Among the Celts on the other band the burgess body, continued at all times to be the clan, prince and council presided over the canton and not over any town, and the general diet of the canton formed the authority of last resort in the state The town had, as in the East, merely mercantile and strategic, not political importance, for which reason the Gallic townships, even when walled and very con siderable such as Vienna and Genava, were in the view of the Greeks and Romans merely villages In the time of Caesar the original clan-constitution still subsisted substantially unaltered among the insular Celts and in the northern cantons of the mainland, the general assembly beld the supreme authority, the prince was in essential questions bound by its decrees, the common council was numerous-it numbered in certain clans six hundred members-but does not appear to have had more / importance than the senate under the Roman kings. In the more stirring southern portion of the land, again, one or two generations before Caesar-the children of the last kings were still living in his time-there had occurred, at least among the larger clans, the Arverns, Haedus, Sequans, Helvets, a revolu tion which set aside the royal dominion and gave the power into the hands of the nobility

It is simply the reverse side of the total want of urban common

was to

all appearance a high hobility, for the most part perhaps the members of the royal or formerly myal families, as indeed it is remarkable that the heads of the opposite parties in the same clan very frequently belong to the same house These great families combined in their hands financial, warlike, and political standency. They menopolited the leases of the profitable states of the state. They compelled the common freemen, who were opposed by the link of eleber, to bottom from them, and to surrender their free few first de facta no elektore, then de jure as bonderen. They develoned the existen of retiners, that is, the president of the scholary to survived thempoleen with a kraving of lister of record or exilication and the season to be the a state without the state and taith a cit the engle that the their tack proof there e is a their elected that began in the matical and the entering in between the presentionality broken en the ever annealth. Her a stare, which augmented about AT BOTH OTHER KIND AND IN THE SET BEFORE OR RECEIVE TO BE COME TO A SECRET AS THE Lak mille kajang katamakan kint kant dan kabupatan kendanan ini ter diction, it is c'est that early are one way an in legendent dynast while than a but you et his eles. It was er, the leading families ni tile definent al les more el color e conocert met tilberelle intermantinger and epoceal recalled bound variably a compact largue, ca generation of sele is the essein about him has principles.

The state of the state of the second of the state of the second of the s mails a present to me that a story of the an entry and the trieffer, it means, but also formed and the trieffer, it means, but also formed and the trieffer to the trieffer that the trieffer and trie The has be treated from the force of a point a first force and the first first force.

If has be treated a complete to be entired and the first of the force of the property of the contract of the first force of the first first first first force of the first fo the quality of the free countries. If the other system of seed of among the Celts was not an anexast and hat, and it is a tempor insely recent institution, it is — I a his established had note if a centure, between the Celts and Germans, and which is to be east longed further on most merely possible but even grot at to that the Celts, in Italy as in Gaul, impliyed Germ in schiefly as these bired servants at arms. The "Syura guird " sould therefore in that was be some the usands of year-older than frople suppose. Should the term by which the Romans, perhaps after the example of the Celts, designate the Germans as a nation—the name Germani—be really of Cellie crash the 72, this obviously accords very well with that hypothesis. No doubt these assumptions must necessarily give may, should the word unfactus be explained in a natisfactory way from a construction of the word and actual be explained in a natisfactory way from a Celtic root; as in fact Zeues (Granne, p. 761), though doubtfully, traces it to am's around and argueer, vir. persons moving round or moved round, and so attendants, servants. The circumstance that the word occurs also as a Celtic proper name (Zenss, p. 69), and is perhaps preserved in the Cambrian amach=peasant, labourer (Zeuss, p. 179), cannot decide the point either way.

Therefore the communities were no longer able to maintain the public peace, and sword law reigned throughout. The depen dent found protection only from his master, whom duty and interest compelled to redress the mjury inflicted on his client, the state had no longer the power to protect those who were free, and consequently these gave themselves over in numbers to some powerful man as clients

The common assembly lost its political importance, and even the power of the prince, which should have checked the encroachments of as well as in Latin igment probler?

worker' or Verg consultance worker' or Verg consultance managed to the common council, in which naturally the heads of the anstocracy usurped the government. Of course under such circumstances there was agitation in the several claims much in the same way as there had been ignation in Latum for centuries after the expulsion of the kings while the nobility of the different communities combined to form a separate alliance hostile to the power of the community, the multitude ceased not to desire the restoration of the monarrhy, and not unfrequently an eminent nobleman attempted, is Spurius Cassius had done in Rome, with the support of the mass of those belonging to the canton to break down the power of his peers, and to reinstate the crown in its rights for his own special hencif

While the individual cantons were thus irremediably declining the sense of unity was at the same time powerfully summy in the nation and seeking in various ways to take shape and hold That combination of the whole Celtic nobility in contradisting tion to the individual canton unions, while disturbing the existing order of things, awakened and fostered the idea of the collective unity of the nation. The attacks directed against the nation from without, and the continued diminition of its territory in war with its neighbours, operated in the same direction. Like the Hellenes in their wars with the Persius, and the Italians in their wars with the Celts, the Truradpine Gauls seem to have become conscious of the existence and the power of their national units in the wars against Rome Amidst the dissensions of rivel class and all their feud it quarrel ing there might still be heard the voices of those who were ready to purchase the independence of the nation at the cost of the independence of the several cantons, and even at that of the independence of the nobility. The thorough popularity of the opposition to a foreign yoke was shown by the wars of Caesar, with reference to whom the Celtic patriot party occupied a position entirely similar to that of the German patriots towards Napoleon; its extent and organisation are attested, among other things, by the telegraphic rapidity with which news was communicated from one point to another.

<sup>1</sup> From the Celtic words guergaworker and bedfajudgment

The universality and the strength of the Celtic national feeling would be inexplicable but for the circumstance that, amidst the greatest political division, the Celtic nation had for long been centralised in respect of religion and even of theology. The Celtic priesthood or, to use the native name, the corporation of the Druids, certainly embraced the British islands and all Gaul, and perhaps also other Celtic countries, in a common religiousnational bond. It possessed a special head elected by the priests themselves; special schools, in which its very comprehensive tradition was transmitted; special privileges, particularly exemption from taxation and military service, which every clan respected; annual councils, which were held near Chartres at the "centre of the Celtic earth;" and above all, a believing people, who in painful devotion and blind obedience to their priests seem to have been nowise inferior to the Irish of modern times. It may readily be conceived that such a priesthood attempted to usurp, as it partially did usurp, the secular government; where the annual monarchy subsisted, it conducted the elections in the event of an interregnum; it successfully laid claim to the right of excluding individuals and whole communities from religious, and consequently also from civil, society; it was careful to draw to itself the most important civil causes, especially processes as to boundaries and inheritance; on the ground, apparently, of its right to exclude from the community and perhaps also of the national custom that criminals should be taken by preference for the usual human sacrifices, it developed an extensive priestly criminal jurisdiction, which was co-ordinate with that of the kings and vergobrets; it even claimed the right of deciding on war and peace. The Gauls were not far removed from an ecclesiastical state with its pope and councils, its immunities, interdicts, and spiritual courts; only this ecclesiastical state did not, like that of recent times, stand aloof from the nations, but was on the contrary preeminently national.

Rhine, are wholly withdrawn from our view. We are only able to perceive, that about the end of the seventh century of Rome all the land as far as the Rhine was already lost to the Celts, that the Bou, who were probably once settled in Bayana and Bohemia (in 163), were homeless wanderers and that even the Black. Forest formerly possessed by the Helvetin (in 182), if not taken possession of by the German tribes dwelling in the vicinity, was at least waste debatable border land, and was mall likelihood even then, what it was afterwards called, the Helvetian desert. The barbarous strategy of the Germans—which secured them from hostile attacks by laying waste the neighbourhood for miles—seems to have been applied here on the greatest scale.

But the Germans had not remained stationary at the Rhine The march of the Cimbrian and Teutonic host, composed, as respects its flower, of German tribes, which had swept with such force fifty years before over Pannoma, Gaul, Italy, and Spam, seemed to have been nothing but a grand recommansaried Already different German tribes had formed permanent settle ments to the west of the Rhine, especially of its lower course, having intruded as conquerors, these settlers continued to demand hostages and to levy annual tribute from the Gallic.

igment of

canton, and a number of other tribes afterwards comprehended under the name of the Tungri on the Maas in the region of Liège, even the Treveri (about Treves) and the Nervii (in Hamault) two of the largest and most powerful peoples of this region, are directly designated by respectable authorities as Germans The complete credibility of these accounts must certainly remain doubtful, since, as Tacitus remarks in reference to the two peoples last mentioned, it was subsequently, at least in these regions, reckoned an honour to be descended of German blood and not to belong to the little-esteemed Celtic nation, yet the population in the region of the Scheldt, Maas, and Woselle seems certainly to have become, in one way or another, largely mingled with German elements, or at any rate to have come under German influences The German settlements themselves were perhaps small, they were not unimportant, for amidst the chaotic obscurity, through which we see the stream of peoples on the right bunk of the Rhine ebling and flowing about this period, we can well perceive that larger German hordes were preparing to cross the Rhine in the track of these advanced posts. Threatened on two sides by foreign domination and torn by internal dissension, it was scarcely to be expected that the unhappy Celtic nation would now rally and save itself by its own vigour. Dismemberment, and decay in virtue of dismemberment, had hitherto been its history; how should a nation, which could name no day like those of Marathon and Salamis, of Aricia and the Raudine field—a nation which, even in its time of vigour, had made no attempt to destroy Massilia by a united effort—now when evening had come, defend itself against so formidable foes?

The less the Celts, left to themselves, were a match for the Germans, the more reason had the Romans carefully to watch over the complications in which the two nations might be involved. Although the movements thence arising had not up to the present time directly affected them, they and their most important interests were yet concerned in the issue of those movements. As may readily be conceived, the internal condition of the Celtic nation had become speedily and permanently mixed up with its outward relations. As in Greece the Lacedaemonian party combined with Persia against the Athenians, so the Romans from their first appearance beyond the Alps had found a support against the Arverni, who were then the ruling power among the southern Celts, in their rivals for the hegemony, the Haedui; and with the aid of these new "brothers of the Roman nation" they had not merely reduced to subjection the Allobroges and a great portion of the indirect territory of the Arverni, but had also, in the Gaul that remained free, occasioned by their influence the transference of the hegemony from the Arverni to these Haedui. But while the Greeks were threatened with danger to their nationality only from one side, the Celts found themselves hard pressed simultaneously by two national foes; and it was natural that they should seek from the one protection against the other, and that, if the one Celtic party attached itself to the Romans, their opponents should on the contrary form alliance with the Germans. This course was most natural for the Belgae, who were brought by neighbourhood and manifold intermixture into closer relation to the Germans who had crossed the Rhine, and moreover, with their less-developed culture, probably felt themselves at least as much akin to the Suebian of alien race as to their cultivated. Allobrogian or Helvetic countryman. But the southern Celts also, among whom now, as already mentioned, the considerable canton of the Sequani (about Besançon) stood at the head of the party hostile to the Romans, had every reason at this very time to call in the Germans against the Romans who immediately threatened them; the remiss government of the senate and the signs of the revolution preparing in Rome, which had not remained unknown to the Celts, made this very moment seem suitable for ridding themselves of the Roman influence and primarily for humbling the Roman clients, the Haedui. A rupture had taken place between the two cantons respecting the tolls on the Saone, which separated the territory of the Haedui from that of the Sequani, and about the year '$\frac{1}{2}$" the German prince Ariovistus with some 15,000 atmed men had crossed the Rhine as conductore of the Sequani.

The war was prolonged for some years with varying success, on the whole the results were unfavourable to the Haedui Their leader Eporedorix at length called out their whole climits, and marched forth with an enormous superiority of force against the Germans; but these obstimately refused battle, and kept themselves under cover of morasses and forests. It was not forced by this defeat to conclude peace on the terms which the victor proposed, were obliged to renounce the begement, and to consent with their whole adherents to become clients of the Sequani; they had to bind themselves to pay tribute to the Sequani or rather to Ariovistus, and to furnish the children of their principal nobles as hostages; and lastly they had to swear that they would never demand back these hostages nor invoke the intervention of the Romans

٠,

This peace was concluded apparently about \$\frac{4}{2}^{3}\$! Honour and advantage enjoned the Romans to come forward in opposition to it; the noble Haeduan Divitiacus, the head of the Roman party in his clan, and for that reason now banished by his countrymen, went in person to Rome to solicit their intervention. A still more serious warning was the insurrection of the Allobroges in \$\frac{4}{2}^{3}\$! (p 200)—the neighbours of the Sequani—which was beyond doubt connected with these events. In reality orders were issued to the Gallic governors to assist the Haedui; they talked of sending consuls and consular armies over the Alps; but the senate, to whose decision these affairs primarily fell, at length here also crowned great words with little deeds. The insurrection of the Allobroges was suppressed by arms, but nothing was done for the Haedui; on the contrary, Ariovistus was even enrolled in  $\frac{a_0}{L_0}$  in the list of kings friendly with the Romans.

The German warlike prince naturally took this as a renunciation by the Romans of the Celtic land which they had not occupied; he accordingly took up his abode there, and began to establish a German principality on Gallic soil. It was his intention that the numerous bands which he had brought with him, and the still more numerous bands that afterwards followed at his call from home—it was reckoned that up to  $\frac{60.6}{55}$  some 120,000 Germans had crossed the Rhine—this whole mighty immigration of the German nation, which poured through the once opened sluices like a stream over the beautiful West, should become settled there and form a basis on which he might build his dominion over Gaul. The extent of the German settlements which he called into existence on the left bank of the Rhine cannot be determined; beyond doubt it was great, and his projects were far greater still. The Celts were treated by him as a wholly subjugated nation, and no distinction was made between the several cantons. Even the Sequani, as whose hired commander-in-chief he had crossed the Rhine, were obliged, as if they were vanquished enemies, to cede to him for his people a third of their territory—probably upper Alsace afterwards inhabited by the Triboci—where Ariovistus permanently settled with his followers; nay, as if this were not enough, a second third was afterwards demanded of them for the Harudes who arrived subsequently. Ariovistus seemed as if he wished to take up in Gaul the part of Philip of Macedonia, and to play the master over the Celts who were friendly to the Germans no less than over those who adhered to the Romans.

The appearance of the energetic German prince in so dangerous proximity, which could not but in itself excite the most serious apprehension in the Romans, appeared still more threatening, inasmuch as it stood by no means alone. The Usipetes and

¹ That we may not deem this course of things incredible, or even impute to it deeper motives than political ignorance and laziness, we shall do well to realise the frivolous tone in which a distinguished senator like Cicero expresses himself in his correspondence respecting these important Transalpine affairs.

Tencters settled on the night bank of the Rhine nears of the incessant devastation of their territory by the overbearing Suebian tribes, had, the year before Caesar arrived in Gaul mouth of the Rhine They had already taken away from the Menapu there the portion of their territory situated on the right bank, and it might be foreseen that they would make the attempt to establish themselves also on the left. Suchian bands, moreover, assembled between Cologne and Mayence, and threatened to appear as uninvited guests in the opposite Celtic canton of the Treveri Lastly, the territory of the most easterly clan of the Celts, the warlike and numerous Helvetu, was visited with growing frequency by the Germans, so that the Helvetu, who perhaps even apart from this were suffering from over population through the reflux of their settlers from the territory which they had lost to the north of the Rhine, and besides were hable to be completely isolated from their kinsmen by the settlement of Ariovistus in the territory of the Sequant, conceived the desperate resolution of voluntarily evacuating the territory hitherto in their possession to the Germans, and acquiring larger and more fertile abodes to the west of the Jura, along with, if possible, the hegemony in the intenor of Gaul-a plan which some of their districts had already formed and attempted to execute during the Cimbrian invasion (in 171) The Rauraci whose territory (Basic and southern Alsace) was similarly threatened, the remains of the Bou who had already at an earlier period been compelled by the Germans to forsake smaller tribes, made common cause with the Helvetn 4s early as Can their flying parties came over the Jura and even as far as the Roman province, their departure itself could not be much longer delayed, inevitably German settlers would then advance into the important region between the lakes of Constance and Geneva forsaken by its defenders From the sources of the -- bes were in motion.

hy them, it was a

themselves on the failing empire of the Caesars, and even now there seemed on the eve of being carried into effect against the Celts that very movement which was successful five hundred years afterwards against the Romans

Under these circumstances the new governor Gaus Caesar arrived in the spring of \$75 in Narbonese Gaul, which had been added by decree of the senate to his original province embracing Cisalpine Gaul along with Istria and Dalmatia. which was committed to him first for five years (to the end of  $\frac{700}{54}$ ), then in  $\frac{699}{55}$  for five more (to the end of  $\frac{705}{49}$ ), gave him the right to nominate ten lieutenants of propraetorian rank, and (at least according to his own interpretation) to fill up his legions, or even to form new ones at his discretion out of the burgess-population—who were especially numerous in Cisalpine Gaul—of the territory under his sway. The army, which he received in the two provinces, consisted, as regards infantry of the line, of four legions trained and inured to war, the seventh. eighth, ninth, and tenth, or at the utmost 24,000 men, to which fell to be added, as usual, the contingents of the subjects. The cavalry and light-armed troops, moreover, were represented by horsemen from Spain, and by Numidian, Cretan, and Balearic archers and slingers. The staff of Caesar—the élite of the democracy of the capital-contained, along with not a few useless young men of rank, some able officers, such as Publius Crassus the younger son of the old political ally of Caesar, and Titus Labienus, who followed the chief of the democracy as a faithful adjutant from the Forum to the battle-field. Caesar had not received definite instructions; to one who was discerning and courageous these were implied in the circumstances with which he had to deal. The negligence of the senate had to be retrieved, and first of all the stream of German invasion had to be checked.

Just at this time the Helvetic invasion, which was closely interwoven with the German and had been in preparation for years, began. That they might not make a grant of their abandoned huts to the Germans and might render their own return impossible, the Helvetii had burnt their towns and villages; and their long trains of waggons, laden with women, children, and the best part of their movables, arrived from all sides at the Leman lake near Genava (Geneva), where they and their comrades had fixed their rendezvous for the 28th of March of this year. According to their own reckoning the whole body consisted of 368,000 persons, of whom about a fourth part were able to bear arms. As the mountain chain of the Jura, stretching from the Rhine to the Rhone, almost completely closed in the Helvetic country on the west, and its narrow defiles were as ill adapted for the passage of such a caravan as they were well adanted for defence, the leaders had resolved to go round in a southerly direction, and to open up for themselves a way to the west at the point where the Rhone has broken through the mountain chain between the south-western and highest part of the Jura and the Savoy mountains, near the modern Fort de l'Ecluse. But on the right bank here the rocks and precipices come so close to the river that there remained only a narrow nath which could easily be blocked up, and the Sequani, to whom this bank belonged, could with ease intercent the route of the Helvetii. They preferred therefore to pass over, above the point where the Rhone breaks through, to the left Allobrogian bank, with the view of recaining the right bank farther down the stream where the Rhone enters the plain, and then marching on towards the level west of Gaul, where the fertile canton of the Santones (Saintonge, the valley of the Charente) on the Atlantic Ocean was selected by the wanderers for their new abode. This march led, where it touched the left bank of the Rhone, through Roman territory; and Caesar, otherwise not disposed to acquiesce in the establishment of the Helvetii in western Gaul, was firmly resolved not to permit their passage. But of his four legions three were stationed far off at Aquileia; although he called out in baste the militia of the Transalpine province, it seemed scarcely possible with so small a force to hinder the innumerable Celtic host from crossing the Rhone, between its exit from the Leman lake at Geneva and the point of its breaking through the mountains, over a distance of more territory, gained a respite of fifteen days, which was employed in breaking down the bridge over the Rhone at Genava, and barring the southern bank of the Rhone against the enemy by an entrenchment nearly nineteen miles long: it was the first

&lt;sup>1</sup> According to the uncorrected calendar. According to the current rectification, which however here by no means rests on sufficiently trustworthy data, this day corresponds to the 16th of April of the Julian calendar.

On the other hand, the party in Gaul hostile to the Romans, which hoped to obtain a powerful reinforcement in the Helvetii, more especially the Haeduan Dumnorix brother of Divitiacus, and at the head of the national party in his canton as the latter was at the head of the Romans, procured for them a passage through the passes of the Jura and the territory of the Sequani. The Romans had no legal title to forbid this; but other and higher interests were at stake for them in the Helvetic expedition than the question of the formal integrity of the Roman territory-interests which could only be defended, if Caesar, instead of confining himself, as all the governors of the senate and even Marius (iii. 179) had done, to the modest task of watching the frontier, should cross what had hitherto been the frontier at the head of a considerable army. Caesar was general not of the senate, but of the state; he showed no hesitation. He had immediately proceeded from Genava in person to Italy, and with characteristic speed brought up the three legions cantoned there as well as two newly formed legions of recruits.

These troops he united with the corps stationed at Genava, and crossed the Rhone with his whole force. His unexpected appearance in the territory of the Haedui naturally at once restored the Roman party there to power, which was not unimportant as regarded supplies. He found the Helvetii employed in crossing the Saone, and moving from the territory of the Sequani into that of the Haedui; those of them that were still on the left bank of the Saone, especially the corps of the Tigorini, were caught and destroyed by the Romans rapidly advancing. The bulk of the expedition, however, had already passed to the right bank of the river; Caesar followed them and effected the passage, which the unwieldy host of the Helvetii had not been able to accomplish in twenty days, in twenty-four The Helvetii, prevented by this passage of the river on the part of the Roman army from continuing their march westward, turned in a northerly direction, doubtless under the supposition that Caesar would not venture to follow them far into the interior of Gaul, and with the intention, if he should desist from following them, of turning again toward their proper destination. For fifteen days the Roman army marched behind that of the enemy at a distance of about four miles, clinging to its rear, and hoping for an advantageous opportunity of assailing the Helvetian host under conditions favourable to victory, and destroying it. But this moment came not: unwieldy as was the march of the Helvetic caravan, the leaders knew how to

Romans began to suffer from want of necessaries, especially when the Helvetn removed from the Saone and the means of river-transport ceased The non arrival of the supplies promised by the Haedur, from which this embarrassment primarily arose. excited the more suspicion, as both armies were still moving about in their territory Moreover the considerable Roman cavalry, numbering almost 4000 horse, proved utterly untrustworthy-which doubtless admitted of explanation, for they consisted almost wholly of Celtie horsemen, especially of the mounted retainers of the Haeden under the command of Dumnorix the well-known enemy of the Romans, and Caesar himself had taken them still more as hostages than as soldiers There was good reason to believe that a defeat which they suffered at the hands of the far weaker Helyctian cavalry was occasioned by themselves, and that the enemy was informed by them of all occurrences in the Roman camp The position of Caesar grew critical, it was becoming disagreeably evident, how much the Celtic patriot party could effect even with the Haedui in spite of their official alliance with Rome, and of the distinctive interests of this canton inclining it towards the Romans; what was to be the issue, if they ventured deeper and deeper into a country full of excitement and removed daily farther from their means of communication? The armies were just marching past Bibracte (Autun), the capital of the Haedur, at a moderate . Caesar resolved to seize this important place by force

he continued his march into the interior; and it is very possible that he intended to desirt altogether from farther pursuit and to establish himself in Bibracte, But when he ceased from the pursuit and turned against Bibracte, the Heliceth thought that the Romans were making preparations for flight, and now attacked in their turn

Caesar desired nothing better The two armies posted themselves on two parallel chains of hills, the Celts began the engagement, broke the Roman cavalry which advanced into the plain, the document of the stope

y before Caesar's

advantage, descended in their turn to the plain, the Celts again advanced against them, and a reserved Celtic corps took them at the same time in flank. The reserve of the Roman attacking column was pushed forward against the latter; it forced it away from the main body upon the baggage and the barricade of waggons, where it was destroyed. The bulk of the Helvetic host was at length brought to give way, and compelled to beat a retreat in an easterly direction—the opposite of that towards which their expedition led them. This day had frustrated the scheme of the Helvetii to establish for themselves new settlements on the Atlantic Ocean, and handed them over to the pleasure of the victor; but it had been a hot day also for the conquerors. Caesar, who had reason for not altogether trusting his staff of officers, had at the very outset sent away all the officers' horses, so as to make the necessity of holding their ground thoroughly clear to his troops; in fact the battle, had the Romans lost it, would have probably occasioned the annihilation of the Roman army. The Roman troops were too much exhausted to pursue the conquered with vigour; but in consequence of the proclamation of Caesar that he would treat all who should support the Helvetii as like the Helvetii themselves enemies of the Romans, all support was refused to the beaten army whithersoever it went-in the first instance, in the canton of the Lingones (about Langres)—and, deprived of all supplies and of their baggage and burdened by the mass of campfollowers incapable of fighting, they were under the necessity of submitting to the Roman general.

The lot of the vanquished was a comparatively mild one. The Haedui were directed to concede settlements in their territory to the homeless Boii; and this settlement of the conquered foe in the midst of the most powerful Celtic cantons rendered almost the services of a Roman colony. The survivors of the Helvetii and Rauraci, something more than a third of the men that had marched forth, were naturally sent back to their former territory, to defend, under Roman supremacy, the frontier along the upper Rhine against the Germans. Only the south-western point of the Helvetic canton was taken possession of by the Romans, and there subsequently, on the charming shores of the Leman lake, the old Celtic town Noviodunum (now Nyon) was converted into a Roman frontier-fortress, the "Julian equestrian colony." 1

Thus the threatening invasion of the Germans on the upper

&lt;sup>1</sup> Julia Equestris, where the last surname is to be taken as in other colonies of Caesar the surnames of sextanorum, decimanorum, etc. It. Celtic or German horsemen of Caesar who, of course with the the Roman or, at any rate, Latin franchise, received land all

ne Roman in the

Rhine was obviated, and, at the same time, the party hostile to the Romans among the Celts was humbled On the middle Rhine also, where the Germans had already crossed years ag and where the power of Ariovistus which yied with that Rome in Gaul was daily spreading, there was need of simil action, and the occasion for a rupture was easily found companson with the yoke threatened or already imposed ( them by Ariovistus, the Roman supremacy probably now a peared to the greater part of the Celts in this quarter the less evil, the minority, who retained their hatred of the Roman had at least to keep silence A diet of the Celtic tribes of centra Gaul, held under Roman influence, requested the Roman gener. in name of the Celtic nation for aid against the German Caesar consented At his suggestion the Haedui stopped th payment of the tribute stipulated to be paid to Anovistus, an demanded back the hostages furnished, and when Anovisti on account of this breach of treaty attacked the clients of Romi Caesar took occasion thereby to enter into direct negotiatio with him and specially to demand, in addition to the return c and a promise to keep peace with the Haedus, tha more Germans ove

Gaul had become subject southern Gaul to the Romans, and that, as he did not hiode the Romans from taking tribute from the Allobroges, so they should not prevent him from taxing his subjects. In later secret overtures it appeared that the prince was well aware o the circumstances of the Romans, he mentioned the invitations which had been addressed to him from Rome to put Caesar out of the way, and offered, if Caesar would leave to him northern Gaul, to assist him in turn to obtain the sovereignty of Italy As the quarrels of the Celuc nation had opened up an entrance for him into Gaul, he seemed to expect the consolidation of his rule there from the quarrels of the Italian nation Tor centures no such language of power completely on a footing of equality and bluntly and carelessly expressing its independence had been held in presence of the Romans, as was now heard from the Ling of the German host, he summarily refused to come, when the Roman general suggested that he should appear personally before him according to the usual practice with client princes

It was the more necessary not to delay, Caesar immediately set out against Ariovistus apanie seized his troops, especially his officers, when they were to measure their strength with the flower of the German troops that for fourteen years had not come under shelter of a roof: it seemed as if the deep decay of Roman moral and military discipline would show itself and provoke desertion and mutiny even in Caesar's camp. But the general, while declaring that in case of need he would march with the tenth legion alone against the enemy, knew not merely how to influence these by such an appeal to honour, but also how to bind the other regiments to their eagles by warlike emulation. and to inspire the troops with something of his own energy. Without leaving them time for reflection, he led them onward in rapid marches, and fortunately anticipated Ariovistus in the occupation of Vesontio (Besançon), the capital of the Sequani. A personal conference between the two generals, which took place at the request of Ariovistus, seemed as if solely meant to cover an attempt against the person of Caesar; arms alone could decide between the two oppressors of Gaul. The war came temporarily to a stand. In lower Alsace somewhere in the region of Mühlhausen, five miles from the Rhine, the two armies lay at a little distance from each other, till Ariovistus with his very superior force succeeded in marching past the Roman camp, placing himself in its rear, and cutting off the Romans from their base and their supplies. Caesar attempted to free himself from his painful situation by a battle; but Ariovistus did not accept it. Nothing remained for the Roman general but, in spite of his inferior strength, to imitate the movement of the Germans, and to recover his communications by making two legions march past the enemy and take up a position beyond the camp of the Germans, while four legions remained in the former camp. Ariovistus, when he saw the Romans divided, attempted an assault on their lesser camp; but the Romans repulsed it. Under the impression made by this success, the whole Roman army was led on to the attack; and the Germans also placed themselves in battle array, in a long line, each tribe for itself, the cars of the army with the baggage and women being placed behind them to render flight more difficult. The right wiog of the Romans, led by Caesar himself, threw itself rapidly on the enemy, and drove them before it; the right wing of the Germans was in like manner successful. The balance still stood coual: but the tactics of the reserve, which had decided so many other conflicts with barbarians, decided the conflict with the Germans also in favour of the Romans; their third line, which Publius Crassus seasonably sent to render help, restored the battle on the left wing and thereby decided the victory. The pursuit was continued to the Rhine; only a few, including the king, succeeded in escaping to the other bank ("x").

Goler (Caesars gall. Krieg, p. 45, etc.) thinks that he has found the field of battle at Cernay not far from Mühlhausen, which, on the whole, agrees with Napoleon's (Pricis, p. 35) placing of the battle-field in the district of Belfort. This hypothesis, although not certain, suits the circumstances of the case; for the fact that Caesar required seven days' march for the short space from Besançon to that point, is explained by his own remark (i. 41) that he had taken a circuit of fifty miles to avoid the mountain paths; and the whole description of the pursuit continued as far as the Rhine, and evidently not lasting for several days but ending on the very day of the battle, decides—the authority of tradition being equally balanced—in favour of the view that the battle was fought five, not fifty, miles from the Rhine. The proposal of Rüstow (Einleitung zu Caesars Comm. p. 117) to transfer the field of battle to the upper Saar rests on a misunderstanding. The corn expected from the Sequani, Leuci, Lingones was not to come to the Roman army in the course of their march against Ariovistus, but to be delivered at Besançon before their departure, and taken by the troops along with them; as is clearly apparent from the fact that Caesar, while pointing his troops to those supplies, comforts them at the same time with the hope of corn to be brought in on the route. From Besançon Caesar commanded the region of Langres and Epinal, and, as may be well conceived, preferred to levy his requisitions there rather than in the exhausted districts from which he came.

Thus brilliantly the Roman rule announced its advent to the mighty stream, which the Italian soldiers here saw for the first time; by a single fortunate battle the line of the Rhine was won. The fate of the German settlements on the left bank of the Rhine lay in the hands of Caesar; the victor could destroy them, but he did self-defence nor ...

i f the frontier

but also better suggest all their own interest in the preservation of their newly-won settlements severed them from their countrymen across the Rhine, so that in their solated position they could not avoid adhering to the central power. Cassar here, as everywhere, preferred conquered foes to doubtful friends; he left the Germans settled by Ariovistus along the left bank of the Rhine—the Triboton about Strasburg, the Kemetes about Spirés, the Vangiones about Worms—in possession of their new abodes, and entrusted them with the guarding of the Rhine-frontier against their countrymen.

<sup>1</sup>This seems the samplest hypothesis regarding the origin of these Germanic settlements. That Ariovistus settled these peoples on the middle Rhine is probable, because they fight in his samy (for § 5)1 and do not appear earlier; that Gestar left them in possession of that settlements is probable, because he in presence of Ariovistus declared himself division forced the Viromandui down the declivity. But the right wing, where the general himself was present, was outfanked by the far more numerous Nervii the more easily, as the central division carried away by its own success had evacuated the ground alongside of it, and even the half-ready camp was occupied by the Nervii; the two legions, each separately rolled together into a dense mass and assailed in front and on both flanks, deprived of most of their officers and their best soldiers, contingent of the Treveri, galloped off at full speed, that from

news of the defeat

among the foremost; his example, his call even now inspiring enthusiasm, induced the wavering ranks to rally. They had already in some measure extricated themselves and had at least restored the connection between the two legions of this wing, when help arrived-partly down from the crest of the bank, where in the interval the Roman rearguard with the baggage had appeared, partly from the other bank of the river, where Labienus had meanwhile penetrated to the enemy's camp and taken possession of it, and now, perceiving at length the danger that menaced the right wing, despatched the victorious tenth legion to the aid of his general. The Nervii, separated from their confederates and simultaneously assailed on all sides, now showed, when fortune turned, the same heroic courage as when they believed themselves victors; still over the pile of corpses of their fallen comrades they fought to the last man, According to their own statement, of their six hundred senators only three survived this day.

After this annihilating defeat the Nervii, Atrebates, and Viromandui were obliged doubtless to recognise the Roman supremacy. The Aduatud, who arrived too late to take part in the fight on the Sambre, attempted still to hold their ground in the strongest of their towns (on the mount Falhize near the Mass not far from Huy), but they too soon submitted. A noctumal attack on the Roman camp in front of the town, which they ventured after the surrender, miscarried; and the perfidy was avenged by the Romans with fearful severity. The clients of the Aduaturi, consisting of the Iburous between the Mass and Rhine and other small adjoining tribes, were declared independent by the Romans, while the Aduatuci taken prisoners were sold under the hammer en masse for the benefit of the Roman treasury. It seemed as if the fate which had befallen the Cimbri still pursued even this last Cimbrian fragment. Caesar contented himself with imposing on the other subject tribes a general disarmament and furnishing of hostages. The Remi became naturally the leading canton in Belgic, like the Haedui in central Gaul; even in the latter several clans at enmity with the Haedui preferred to rank among the clients of the Remi. Only the remote maritime cantons of the Morini (Artois) and the Menapii (Flanders and Brabant), and the country between the Scheldt and the Rhine inhabited in great part by Germans, remained still for the present exempt from Roman invasion and in possession of their hereditary freedom.

The turn of the Aremorican cantons came. In the autumn of 697 Publius Crassus was sent thither with a Roman corps; he induced the Veneti-who as masters of the ports of the modern Morbihan and of a respectable fleet occupied the first place among all the Celtic cantons in navigation and commerce-and generally the coast-districts between the Loire and Seine, to submit to the Romans and give them hostages. But they soon repented. When in the following winter  $\begin{pmatrix} c_0 r_1 - c_0 r_0 \\ c_0 r_1 - c_0 r_0 \end{pmatrix}$  Roman officers came to these regions to levy requisitions of grain there, they were detained by the Veneti as counter-hostages. The example thus set was quickly followed not only by the Aremorican cantons, but also by the maritime cantons of the Belgae that still remained free; where, as in some cantons of Normandy, the common council refused to join the insurrection, the multitude put them to death and attached itself with redoubled zeal to the national cause. The whole coast from the mouth of the Loire to that of the Rhine rose against Rome; the most resolute patriots from all the Celtic cantons hastened thither to cooperate in the great work of liberation; they already calculated on the rising of the whole Belgic confederacy, on aid from Britain, on the arrival of Germans from beyond the Rhine.

Caesar sent Labienus with all the cavalry to the Rhine, with a view to hold in check the agitation in the Belgic province, and in case of need to prevent the Germans from crossing the river; another of his lieutenants, Quintus Titurius Sabinus, went with three legions to Normandy, where the main body of the insurgents assembled. But the powerful and intelligent Veneti were the true centre of the insurrection; the chief attack by land and sea was directed against them. Caesar's lieutenant.

Decimus Brutus, brought up the fleet formed partly of the ships of the subject Celtic cantons, partly of a number of Roman galleys hastily built on the Loire and manned with rowers from the Narbonese province; Caesar himself advanced with the flower of his infantry into the territory of the Veneti. But these were prepared beforehand, and had with equal skill and resolution availed themselves of the favourable circumstances which the nature of the ground in Britany and the possession of a considerable naval power presented. The country was much intersected and poorly furnished with grain, the towns were situated for the most part on cliffs and tongues of land, and were accessible from the mainland only by shoals which it was easily with everything needful, and in the event of the worst could accomplish their evacuation. The legions expended their time and strength in the sieges of the Venetian towns, only to see the substantial fruits of victory ultimately carried off in the vessels of the enemy.

Accordingly when the Roman fleet, long detained by storms at the mouth of the Loire, armved at length on the coast of Brittany, it was left to decide the struggle by a naval battle. The Celts, conscious of their superiority on this element, brought forth their fleet against that of the Romans commanded by Brutus. Not only did it number 220 sail, far more than the Phad been able to bring up, but their high-built strong with flat bottoms were also far better adapted for the strong with flat bottoms were also far better adapted for the strong with flat bottoms were also far better adapted for the strong were falso far better adapted for the strong were falso far better adapted for the strong were also far better adapted for the strong were falso far better adapted for the strong were also far better adapted for the strong were strong were also far better adapted for the strong were also far b

with flat bottoms were also far better adapted
with flat bottoms were also far better adapted
is rather been than the low, is the Romans
could reach the high deck of the enemy's vessels, and the iron beaks recoiled powerless from the strong oaken planks. But the Roman manners cut the ropes, by which the yards were wreck , and enng eived which to gain them:

but unhappily for them there suddenly set in a dead calm, and the immense fleet, towards the equipment of which the maritime cantons had applied all their energies, was almost wholly destroyed by the Romans. Thus was this naval battle-so far as historical knowledge reaches, the earliest fought on the Atlantic Ocean—just like the engagement at Mylae two hundred years before (ii. 37), notwithstanding the most unfavourable circumstances, decided in favour of the Romans by a lucky invention suggested by necessity. The consequence of the victory achieved by Brutus was the surrender of the Veneti and of all Brittany. More with a view to impress the Celtic nation, after so manifold evidences of clemency towards the vanquished, by an example of fearful severity now against those whose resistance had been obstinate, than with the view of punishing the breach of treaty and the arrest of the Roman officers. Caesar caused the whole common council to be executed and the people of the Venetian canton to the last man to be sold into slavery. By this dreadful fate, as well as by their intelligence and their patriotism, the Veneti have more than any other Celtic clan acquired a title to the sympathy of posterity.

Sabinus meanwhile opposed to the levy of the coast-states assembled on the Channel the same tactics by which Caesar had in the previous year conquered the Belgic general levy on the Aisne; he stood on the defensive till impatience and want invaded the ranks of the enemy, and then managed by deceiving them as to the temper and strength of his troops, and above all by means of their own impatience, to allure them to an imprudent assault upon the Roman camp, in which they were defeated; whereupon the militia dispersed and the country as far as the Seine submitted.

The Morini and Menapii alone persevered in withholding their recognition of the Roman supremacy. To compel them to this, Caesar appeared on their borders; but, rendered wiser by the experiences of their countrymen, they avoided accepting battle on the borders of their land, and retired into the forests which then stretched almost without interruption from the Ardennes towards the German Ocean. The Romans attempted to make a road through the forest with the axe, ranging the felled trees on each side as a barricade against the enemy's attacks; but even Caesar, daring as he was, found it advisable after some days of most laborious marching, especially as it was verging towards winter, to order a retreat, although but a small portion of the Morini had submitted and the more powerful Menapii retreat as far as the nearest Romau camp, only two days' much distant. Some things in these statements seemed no fiction, that the little canton of the Eburones specially favoured by the Romans (p 234) should have undertaken the attack of its own accord was in reality incredible, and, owing to the difficulty of effecting a communication with the other far distant camps, honour and prudence required them to reject the capitulation offered by the enemy and to maintain the post entrusted to them Yet, although in the council of war numerous voices and especially the weighty voice of Lucius Aurunculeius Cotta supported this view, the commandant determined to accept the proposal of Ambiorix The Roman troops accordingly marched off next morning, but when they had arrived at a narrow valley about two miles from the camp they found themselves sur rounded by the Eburones and every outlet closed They attempted to open a way for themselves by force of arms, but the Eburones would not enter into any close combat, and con tented themselves with discharging their missiles from their unassailable positions into the dense mass of the Romans Bewildered, as if seeking delivemnce from treachery at the hands of the traitor, Sabinus requested a conference with Ambiorix, it was granted, and he and the officers accompanying him were first disarmed and then slain After the fall of the commander the Eburones threw themselves from all sides at once on the exhausted and despairing Romans, and broke their ranks, most of them, including Cotta who had already been wounded, met their death in this attack, a small portion, who had suc ceeded in regaining the abandoned camp, flung themselves on their own swords during the following night. The whole corps was annihilated

This success, such as the insurgents themselves had hardly ventured to expect, increased the excitement among the Celic patriots so greatly that the Romans were no longer sure of a

rse points First of

Reinforced by the

levy of the Aduatur, who gladly embraced the opportunity of requiting the mjury done to them by Caesar, and of the powerful and still unsubdued Menapil, they appeared in the territory of the Nervi, who immediately joined them, and the whole host thus swelled to 60,000 came before the Roman camp formed in the Nervian canton. Quintus Cicero, who commanded there, had with his weak corps a difficult position, especially as the besiegers, learning from their foes, constructed ramparts and trenches, testudines and movable towers after the Roman fashion, and showered fire-balls and burning spears over the straw-covered huts of the camp. The only hope of the besieged rested on Caesar, who lay not so very far off with three legions in his winter encampment in the region of Amiens; but—a significant proof of the feeling that prevailed in Gaul—for a considerable time not the slightest indication reached the general either of the disaster of Sabinus or of the perilous situation of Cicero.

At length a Celtic horseman from Cicero's camp succeeded in stealing through the enemy to Caesar. On receiving the startling news Caesar immediately set out, although only with two weak legions, together numbering about 7000, and 400 horsemen; nevertheless the announcement that Caesar was advancing sufficed to induce the insurgents to raise the siege. It was time; not one tenth of the men in Cicero's camp remained unwounded. Caesar, against whom the insurgent army had turned, deceived the enemy, in the way which he had already on several occasions successfully applied, as to his strength; under the most unfavourable circumstances they ventured an assault upon the Roman camp and suffered a defeat. It is singular, but characteristic of the Celtic nation, that in consequence of this one lost battle, or perhaps rather in consequence of Caesar's appearance in person on the scene of conflict, the insurrection, which had commenced so victoriously and extended so widely, suddenly and pitiably broke off the war. The Nervii, Menapii, Aduatuci, Eburones, returned to their homes. The forces of the maritime cantons, who had made preparations for assailing the legion in Brittany, did the same. The Treveri, through whose leader Indutiomarus the Eburones, the clients of the powerful neighbouring canton, had been chiefly induced to that so successful attack, had taken arms on the news of the disaster of Aduatuca and advanced into the territory of the Remi with the view of attacking the legion cantoned there under the command of Labienus; they too desisted for the present from continuing the struggle. Caesar not unwillingly postponed farther measures against the revolted districts till the spring, in order not to expose his troops which had suffered much to the whole severity of the Gallic win'

248

---- in the field when the

- had ing manner by the ... ordered. The insurrection meanwhile pursued its warse, although there was for the moment a suspension of arms. Its chief seats in central Gaul were, partly the districts of the Carnutes and the neighbouring Senones (about Sens), the latter of whom drove the king appointed by Caesar out of their country; partly the region of the Treven, who invited the whole Celtic emigrants and the Germans beyond the Rhine to take part in the impending national war, and called out their whole force, with a view to advance in the spring a second time into the territory of the Remi, to capture the corps of Labienus, and to seek a communication with the insurgents on the Seine and Loire. The deputies of these three cantons remained absent from the diet convoked by Caesar in central Gaul, and thereby declared war just as openly as a part of the Belgic cantons had done by the attacks on the camps of Sabinus and

The winter was drawing to a close when Caesar set out with his army, which meanwhile had been considerably reinforced, against the insurgents The attempts of the Treven to concentrate the revolt had not succeeded, the agitated districts were kept in check by the marching in of Roman troops, and those in open rebellion were attacked in detail. First the Nervii were routed by Caesar in person. The Senones and Carnutes met the same fate The Menapu, the only canton which had never submitted to the Romans, were compelled r the Treveri Their

by the refusal of the adjoining German tribes to furnish them with mercenanes, partly by the fact that Indutiomaris, the soul of the whole movement, had fallen in a skirmish with the cavalry of Labrents But they did not on this account abandon their projects With their whole force they appeared in front of Labierus and waited for the German bands that were to follow, for their recruiting agents found a better reception than they had met with from the dwellers on the Rhine, among the warlike tribes of the interior of Germany, especially, as it would appear, among the Chatti But when Labienus seemed as if he wished to avoid these and to march off in all haste, the Treveri attacked the Romans even before the Germans arrived and in a most unfavourable spot, and were completely defeated. Nothing remained for the Germans who came up too late but to return; nothing for the Treverian canton but to submit; its government reverted to the head of the Roman party Cingetorix, the son-in-law of Indutiomarus. After these expeditions of Caesar against the Menapii and of Labienus against the Treveri the whole Roman army was again united in the territory of the With the view of rendering the Germans disinclined to come back, Caesar once more crossed the Rhine, in order if possible to strike a vigorous blow against the troublesome neighbours; but, as the Chatti, faithful to their tried tactics. assembled not on their western boundary, but far in the interior, apparently at the Harz mountains, for the defence of the land, he immediately turned back and contented himself with leaving behind a garrison at the passage of the Rhine.

Accounts had thus been settled with all the tribes that took part in the rising; the Eburones alone were passed over but not forgotten. Since Caesar had met with the disaster of Aduatuca, he had worn mourning and had sworn that he would only lay it aside when he should have avenged his soldiers, who had not fallen in honourable war, but had been treacherously murdered. Helpless and passive the Eburones sat in their huts and looked on, as the neighbouring cantons one after another submitted to the Romans, till the Roman cavalry from the Treverian territory advanced through the Ardennes into their land. So little were they prepared for the attack, that the cavalry had almost seized the king Ambiorix in his house; with great difficulty, while his attendants sacrificed themselves on his behalf, he escaped into the neighbouring thicket. Ten Roman legions soon followed the cavalry. At the same time an invitation was issued to the surrounding tribes to hunt the outlawed Eburones and pillage their land in concert with the Roman soldiers; not a few complied with the call, including even an audacious band of Sugambrian horsemen from the other side of the Rhine, who for that matter treated the Romans no better than the Eburones, and had almost by a daring coup de main surprised the Roman camp at Aduatuca. The fate of the Eburones was dreadful. However they might hide themselves in forests and morasses. there were more hunters than game. Many put themselves to death like the grey-haired prince Catuvolcus; only a few saved life and liberty, but among these few was the man whom the Romans sought above all to seize, the prince Ambiorix: with but four horsemen he escaped over the Rhine This execution against the canton which had transgressed above all the rest was followed in the other districts by processes of high treason against individuals. The season for elemency was past. At the bidding of the Roman processual the eminent Carnutic hight Acco was beheaded by Roman lictors (****) and the rule of the *fasces* was thus formally inaugurated. Opposition was silent, tranquility everywhere prevailed. Caesar went as he was wont towards the end of the year (*****) over the Alps, that through the winter he might observe more closely the daily-increasing complications in the capital

The sagacious calculator had on this occasion miscalculated. The fire was smothered, but not extinguished. The stroke, under which the head of Acoo fell, was felt by the whole Celtus nobility. At this very moment the position of affairs presented better prospects than ever. The insurrection of the last winter had evidently failed only through Caesar himself appearing on the scene of action, now he was at a distance, detained on the Po by the imminence of civil war, and the Gallic army, which was collected on the upper Seine, was far separated from its dreaded leader. If a general insurrection now broke out in central Gaul, the Roman army might be surrounded, and the almost undefended old Roman province be overing, before Caesar reappeared beyond the Alps, even if the Italian complications did not altogether prevent him from further concerning homes fail about Gaul.

Conspirators from all the cantons of central Gaul assembled, the Carnutes, as most directly affected by the execution of Aco, offered to take the lead On a set day in the winter of ??-?-?? the Carnutian knights Gutrustus and Conconnetodumous pave

The most vehement of Gaul, the patriots

everywhere bestured themselves. But nothing stirred the nation so deeply as the insurrection of the Artern. The government of this community, which had formerly under its hings been the first in southern Gaul, and had still after the fall of its princedom occasioned by the unfortunate wars against Rome (in 158) continued to be one of the wealthest, most cruitsed, and most powerful in all Gaul, had hitherto involably adhered to Rome. Even now the patriot party in the governing common council was in the minority, an attempt to induce it to join the insurrection was in vain. The attacks of the patriots were therefore directed against the common council and the existing constitution itself; and the more so, that the change of constitution which among the Arvernians had substituted the common council for the prince (p. 208) had taken place after the victories of the Romans and probably under their influence.

The leader of the Arvernian patriots Vercingetorix, one of those nobles whom we meet with among the Celts, of almost regal authority in and beyond his canton, and a stately, brave, sagacious man to boot, left the capital and summoned the country people, who were as hostile to the ruling oligarchy as to the Romans, at once to re-establish the Arvernian monarchy and to go to war with Rome. The multitude quickly joined him: the restoration of the throne of Lucrius and Betuitus was at the same time the declaration of a national war against Rome. The centre of unity, from the want of which all previous attempts of the nation to shake off the foreign yoke had failed, was now found in the new self-nominated king of the Arvernians. Vercingetorix became for the Celts of the continent what Cassivellaunus was for the insular Celts; the feeling strongly pervaded the masses that he, if any one, was the man to save the nation.

The west from the mouth of the Garonne to that of the Seine was rapidly infected by the insurrection, and Vercingetorix was recognised by all the cantons there as commander-in-chief; where the common council made any difficulty, the multitude compelled it to join the movement; only a few cantons, such as that of the Bituriges, required compulsion to join it, and these perhaps only for appearance' sake. The insurrection found a less favourable soil in the regions to the east of the upper Loire. Everything here depended on the Haedui; and these wavered. The patriotic party was very strong in this canton; but the old antagonism to the hegemony of the Arvernians counterbalanced their influence—to the most serious detriment of the insurrection, as the accession of the eastern cantons, particularly of the Sequani and Helvetii, was conditional on the accession of the Haedui, and generally in this part of Gaul the decision rested with them. While the insurgents were thus labouring partly to induce the cantons that still hesitated, especially the Haedui, to join them, partly to get possession of Narbo—one of their leaders, the daring Lucterius, had already appeared on the Tarn within the limits of the old province—the Roman commander-in-chief suddenly presented himself in the depth of winter, unexpected alike by finend and foe, on this side of the Alps. He quickly made the necessary preparations to cover the old province, and not only so, but sent also a cops over the snow-covered Cevennes into the Arvennan territory, but he could not remain here, where the accession of the Haedin the Gallic alliance might any moment cut him off from his army encamped about Sens and Langres. With all secresy he went to Vienna, and thence, attended by only a few horsemen, through the territory of the Haedin to his troops. The hopes, which had induced the conspirators to declare themselves, vanished, peace continued in Italy, and Caesar was once more at the head of his army.

But what were they to do? It was folly under such circum stances to let the matter come to the decision of arms, for these had already decided irrevocably. They might as well attempt to shake the Alps by throwing stones at them as to shake the legions by means of the Celtic bands, whether these might be congregated in huge masses or sacrificed in detail canton after canton. Vercingetorix despaired of defeating the Romans. He adopted a system of wariare similar to that by which Cassivellaumis had saved the insular Celts. The Roman infantry was not to be vanquished, but Caesar's cavalry consisted almost exclusively of the contingent of the Celtic nobility, and was practically dissolved by the general revolt. It was possible for the insurrection, which was in fact essentially composed of the Celtic nobility, to develop such a superiority in this arm, that it could lay waste the land far and wide, burn down towns and villages, destroy the magazines, and endanger contractions.

ting

of that time regularly associated with it. The immense and

ing, marching, and manœuvring, and some perception that the soldier is not destined merely for single combat. Learning from the enemy, he adopted in particular the Roman system of encampment on which depended the whole secret of the tactical superiority of the Romans, for in consequence of it every Roman corps combined all the advantages of the garnson of a fortiess with all the advantages of an offensive army. It is true that a system completely adapted to Britain which had few towns and to its rude, resolute, and on the whole united inhabitants was not absolutely transferable to the rich regions on the Loire and their indolent inhabitants on the eve of utter political dissolution. Vercingetorix at least accomplished this much, that they did not attempt as hitherto to hold every town with the result of holding none; they agreed to destroy the places not capable of defence before attack reached them, but to defend with all their might the strong for tresses. At the same time the Arvernian king did what he could to bind to the cause of their country the cowardly and backward by stern severity, the hesitating by entreaties and representations, the covetous by gold, the decided opponents by force, and to compel or allure the rabble high or low to some manifestation of patriotism.

Even before the winter was at an end, he threw himself on the Boii settled by Caesar in the territory of the Haedui, with the view of annihilating these, almost the sole trustworthy allies of Rome, before Caesar came up. The news of this attack induced Caesar, leaving behind the baggage and two legions in the winter quarters of Agedincum (Sens), to march immediately and earlier than he would doubtless otherwise have done against the insurgents. He remedied the sorely-felt want of cavalry and light infantry in some measure by gradually bringing up German mercenaries, who instead of using their own small and weak ponies were furnished with Italian and Spanish horses partly bought, partly procured by requisition from the officers. Caesar, after having caused Cenabum, the capital of the Carnutes, which had given the signal for the revolt, to be pillaged and laid in ashes, moved over the Loire into the country of the Bituriges. He thereby induced Vercingetorix to abandon the siege of the town of the Boii, and to resort likewise to the Bituriges. Here the new mode of warfare was first to be tried. By order of Vercingetorix more than twenty townships of the Bituriges perished in the flames on one day; the general decreed a similar self-devastation as to the neighbouring cantons, so far as they could be reached by the Roman foraging parties.

According to his intention, Avaricum (Bourges), the rich

&lt;sup>1</sup> This, it is true, was only possible so long as offensive weapons chiefly aimed at cutting and stabbing. In the modern mode of warfare, as Napoleon has excellently explained, this system has become inapplicable, because with our offensive weapons operating from a distance the deployed position is more advantageous than the concentrated. In Caesar's time the reverse was the case.

winter, unexpected alke by frend and foe, on this side of the Alps He quickly made the necessary preparations to cover the old province, and not only so, but sent also a corps over the snow-covered Covennes into the Arvennan territory, but he could not remain here, where the accession of the Haedin to the Gallic alliance might any moment cut him off from his army encamped about Sens and Langres With all secrety he went to Vienna, and thence, attended by only a few horsmen, through the territory of the Haedin to his troops The hopes, which had induced the conspirators to declare themselves, vanished, peace continued in Italy, and Caesar was once more at the head of his army

But what were they to do? It was folly under such circum stances to let the matter come to the decision of arms, for these had already decided irrevocably. They might as well attempt to shake the Alps by throwing stones at them as to shake the legions by means of the Celtic bands whether these might be congregated in huge masses or sacrificed in detail canton after canton. Vercingetorix despaired of defeating the He adopted a system of warfare similar to that by which Cassivellaunus had saved the insular Celts The Roman infantry was not to be vanquished, but Caesar's cavalry consisted almost exclusively of the contingent of the Celtic nobility, and was practically dissolved by the general revolt. It was possible for the insurrection, which was in fact essentially composed of the Celtic nobility, to develop such a superiority in this arm, that it could lay waste the land far and wide, burn down towns and villages, destroy the magazines, and endanger ngiy

infantry archers who were according to the mode of fighting of that time regularly associated with it. The immense and self-obstructing masses of the militia of the line he did not indeed send home, but he did not allow them to face the enemy, and attempted toumpart to them gradually some capacity of intending, marching, and manceuvring, and some perception that the soldier is not destined merely for single combat. Learning from the enemy, he adopted in particular the Roman system of encampment on which depended the whole secret of the tactical superiority of the Romans for in consequence of it every Roman copys combined all the advantages of the garrison of a fortiess.

winter, unexpected alike by friend and foe, on this side of the Alps. He quickly made the necessary preparations to cover the old province, and not only so, but sent also a corps over the snow-covered Cevennes into the Arverman territory: but he could not remain here, where the accession of the Haedin to the Gallic alliance might any moment cut him off from his army encamped about Sens and Langres. With all secresy he went to Vienna, and thence, attended by only a few horsemen, through the territory of the Haedin to his troops. The hopes, which had induced the conspirators to declare themselves, vanished, peace continued in Italy, and Caesar was once more

at the head of his atmy.

But what were they to do? It was folly under such circum stances to let the matter come to the decision of arms, for these had already decided irrevocably. They might as well attempt to shake the Alps by throwing stones at them as to shake the legions by means of the Celuc bands, whether these might be congregated in huge masses or samficed in detail canton after canton. Vercingetoric desparted of defeating the Romans. He adopted a system of warfare similar to that by which Cassivellaumis had saved the insular Celts. The Roman infantry was not to be vanquished, but Caesar's cavality consisted almost exclusively of the contingent of the Celtic nobility, and was practically dissolved by the general revolt. It was possible for the insurrection, which was in fact essentially composed of the Celtic nobility, to develop such a superiority in this arm, that it could lay waste the land far and wide, burn down towns and villages, destroy the magazines, and endanger

infantry-archers who were according to the mode of fighting of that time regularly associated with it. The immense and self-obstructing masses of the militia of the line he did not indeed send home, but he did not allow them to face the enemy, and attempted toimpart to them gradually-some capacity of intreching, marching, and manceuving, and some perception that the soldier is not destined merely for single combat. Learning from the enemy, he adopted in particular the Roman system of encampment on which depended the whole secret of the tactical superiority of the Romans, for in consequence of stevers Roman copies conhoned all the advantages of the garrison of a fortrest able to save the nations to which they belonged from a foreign yoke, but they spared them the last remaining disgrace—an inglorious fall. Vercingetorix, just like the Carthaginian, was obliged to contend not merely against the public foe, but also and above all against that anti-national opposition of

also and above all against that anti-national opposition of interests. And yet there can hardly be a more marked contrast than between the sober townsman of the Phoenician mercantile city, whose plans were directed towards one great object with unchanging energy throughout fifty years, and the bold prince of the Celtic land, whose mighty deeds and high-minded selfsacrifice fall within the compass of one brief summer. The whole ancient world presents no more genuine knight, whether as regards his essential character or his outward appearance. But man ought not to be a mere knight, and least of all the statesman. It was the knight, not the hero, who disdained to escape from Alesia, when he alone was of more consequence to the nation than a hundred thousand ordinary brave men. It was the knight, not the hero, who gave himself up as a sacrifice, when the only thing gained by that sacrifice was that the nation publicly dishonoured itself and with equal covardice and absurdity employed its last breath in proclaiming that its great historical death-struggle was a crime against its oppressor. How very different was the conduct of Hannibal in similar positions! It is impossible to part from the noble king of the Arverni without a feeling of historical and human sympathy; but it is characteristic of the Celtic nation, that its greatest in bringing the war quickly to an end. Of the ten years of his governorship seven had elapsed, and the last was called in question by his political opponents in the capital; he could only reckon with some degree of certainty on two more summers, and, while his interest as well as his honour required that he should hand over the newly-acquired regions to his successor in a condition of tolerable peace and tranquillity, there was in truth but scanty time to bring about such a state of things. To exercise mercy was in this case still more a necessity for the victor than for the vanquished; and he might thank his stars that the internal dissensions and the easy temperament of the Celts met him in this respect half way. Where—as in the two most eminent cantons of central Gaul, those of the Haedui and Arverni-there existed a strong party well disposed to Rome, the cantons obtained immediately after the fall of Alesia a complete restoration of their former relations with Rome, and even their captives, 20,000 in number, were released without ransom, while those of the other clans passed into the hard bondage of the victorious legionaries. The greater portion of the Gallic districts submitted like the Haedui and Arverni to their fate, and allowed their inevitable punishment to be inflicted without farther resistance. But not a few clung in foolish frivolity or sullen despair to the lost cause, till the Roman troops of execution appeared within their borders. Such expeditions were in the winter of  ${}^{7}_{52} = {}^{7}_{51}$  undertaken against the Bituriges and the Carnutes.

More serious resistance was offered by the Bellovaci, who in the previous year had kept aloof from the relief of Alesia; they seem to have wished to show that their absence on that decisive day at least did not proceed from want of courage or of love for freedom. The Atrebates, Ambiani, Caletes, and other Belgic cantons took part in this struggle; the brave king of the Atrebates Commius, whose accession to the insurrection the Romans had least of all forgiven, and against whom recently Labienus had even directed a repulsive attempt at assassination, brought to the Bellovaci 500 German horse, whose value the campaign of the previous year had shown. The resolute and talented Bellovacian Correus, to whom the chief conduct of the war had fallen, waged warfare as Vercingetorix had waged it, and with no small success. Although Caesar had gradually brought up the greater part of his army, he could neither bring the infantry of the Bellovaci to a battle, nor even prevent it from taking up other positions which afforded better protection against his augmented forces, while the Roman borse, especially the Celtic contingents, suffered most severe losses in various combats at the bands of the enemy's cavalry, especially of the German cavalry of Commus But after Correus had met his death in a skirmish with the Roman foragers, the resistance bere too was broken, the victor proposed tolerable conditions, to which the Bellovaci along with their confederates submitted The Treveri were reduced to obedience by Labienus, and incidentally the territory of the outlawed Eburones was once more traversed and laid waste. Thus the last resistance of the Belgic confederacy was broken The mantime cantons still made an attempt to defend themselves against the Roman domination in concert with their neighbours on the Loire Insurgent bands from the Andian, Carnutic, and other surrounding cantons assembled on the lower Loue and besieged in Lemonum (Postiers) the prince of the Pictones who was friendly to the Romans here too a considerable Roman force soon appeared against them, the insurgents abandoned the siege, and retreated with the stew of placing the Loure between themselves and the enemy, but were overtaken on the march and defeated, whereupon the Carnutes and the other revolted cantons, including even the maritime ones, sent in their submission

The resistance was at an end, save that an isolated leader of free bands still here and there upheld the national banner. The bold Drappes and the brave comrade in aims of Vertingetonix Lucterius, after the breaking up of the army united on the Lorier, gathered together the most resolute men, and with these themselves into the strong mountain town of Uzellodunum on the Lot, which amust severe and fatal conflicts they succeeded in sufficiently provisioning. In spite of the loss of their leaders, of whom Drappes had been taken prisoner, and Lucterius had been cut off from the town, the garrison resurfut to the uttermost, it was not till Caesar appeared in person, and under his orders the spring from which the besieged derived their water was diverted by means of subternancan drains, that throughout Gaul, allowed king Commius, who still held out in the region of Arras and maintained desultory warfare with the Roman troops there down to the winter of  ${}^{7}_{57} = {}^{7}_{50}$ , to make his peace, and even acquiesced when the irritated and justly distrustful man haughtily refused to appear in person in the Roman camp. It is very probable that Caesar in a similar way allowed himself to be satisfied with a merely nominal submission, perhaps even with a de facto armistice, in the less accessible districts of the north-west and north-east of Gaul.<sup>1</sup>

This is usually sought at Capdenae not far from blocae. Gover has recently declared in melt in layour of Eurech to the west of Lahors, a half which had been previously suggested.

Thus was Gaul-or, in other words, the land west of the Rhine and north of the Pyrenees-rendered subject after only eight years of conflict  $\binom{6}{5}\frac{6}{8}=\binom{7}{5}\binom{3}{1}$  to the Romans. Hardly a year after the full pacification of the land, at the beginning of 70.5, the Roman troops had to be withdrawn over the Alps in consequence of the civil war which at length broke out in Italy, and there remained nothing but at the most some weak divisions of recruits in Gaul. Nevertheless the Celts did not again rise against the foreign yoke; and, while in all the old provinces of the empire there was fighting against Caesar, the newly-acquired country alone remained continuously obedient to its conqueror. Even the Germans did not during those decisive years repeat their attempts to conquer new settlements on the left bank of the Rhine. As little did there occur in Gaul any national insurrection or German invasion during the subsequent crises, although these offered most favourable opportunities. If disturbances broke out anywhere, such as the rising of the Bellovaci against the Romans in 708, the movements were so isolated and so unconnected with the complications in Italy, that they were suppressed without material difficulty by the Roman governors. Certainly this state of peace was most probably, just as was the peace of Spain for centuries, purchased by provisionally allowing the regions that were most remote and most strongly pervaded by national feeling—Brittany, the districts on the Scheldt, the region of the Pyrences—to withdraw them-selves de facto in a more or less definite manner from the Roman allegiance. Nevertheless the building of Caesar—however scanty the time which he found for it amidst other and at the moment still more urgent labours, however unfinished and but provisionally rounded off he may have left it-in substance

&lt;sup>1</sup> This indeed, as may readily be conceived, is not recorded by Caesar himself; but an intelligible hint of it is given by Sallust (Hist. i. 9 Kritz), although he wrote as a partisan of Caesar. Further proofs are furnished by the coins.

stood the test of this fiery trial, as respected both the repelling of the Germans and the subjugation of the Celts

As to superintendence, the territories newly acquired by the governor of Narbonese Gaul remained for the time being united with the province of Narbo, it was not till Caesar gave up this office (12%) that two new governorships—Gaul proper and Belgat—were formed out of the territory which he conquered. That the individual cantons lost their political independence was implied in the very nature of conquest. They became throughout tributary to the Roman community. Their system of tribute however was, of course, not that by means of which the nobles and financial anistocracy turned Asia to profitable account, but, as was the case in Spain, a tribute fixed once for all was imposed on each individual community, and the levying of it was left to itself. In this way forty million sesterces (1400,000) flowed annually from Gaul into the chests of the

to Rome; when Caesar offered his Gallic gold throughout the Roman empire and brought such masses of it at once into the money market that gold as compared with silver fell about

after the conquest, and even the system of chentship, which made certain cantons dependent on others more powerful, was not abolished, altho

was, while making u

hegemonic divisions, and to bower the men favourably disposed to the foreign rule. Caesar spared no pains to form a Roman party in Gaul; extensive rewards in money and specially in confiscated estates were bestived on his adherents, and places in the common council and the first offices of state in their cantons were procured for them by Caesar's influence. These cantons in which a sufficiently strong and trustworthy Roman party existed, such as the Remi, the Lingones, the Hardin, were favoured by the bestowal of a freer communal constitution—favoured by the bestowal of a freer communal constitution—the right of alliance, as it was called—and by preferences in the regulation of the matter of begemony. The national worsh p

and its priests seem to have been spared by Caesar from the outset as far as possible; no trace is found in his case of measures such as were adopted in later times by the Roman regents against the Druidical system, and with this is probably connected the fact that his Gallic wars, so far as we see, do not at all bear the character of religious warfare after the fashion which formed so prominent a feature of the Britannic wars subsequently.

· While Caesar thus showed to the conquered nation every allowable consideration and spared their national, political, and religious institutions as far as was at all compatible with their subjection to Rome, he did so, not as renouncing the fundamental idea of his conquest, the Romanisation of Gaul, but with a view to realise it in the most indulgent way. He did not content himself with leaving the same circumstances, which had already in great part Romanised the south province, to produce their effect likewise in the north; but, like a genuine statesman, he stimulated the natural course of development and sought to shorten as far as possible the always painful period of transition. To say nothing of the admission of a number of Celts of rank into Roman citizenship and even of several perhaps into the Roman senate, it was probably Caesar who introduced, although with certain restrictions, the Latin instead of the native tongue as the official language within the several cantons in Gaul, and who introduced the Roman instead of the national monetary system on the footing of reserving the coinage of gold and of denarii to the Roman authorities, while the smaller money was to be coined by the several cantons but only for circulation within the cantonal bounds, and this too in accordance with the Roman standard. We may smile at the Latin jargon, which the dwellers by the Loire and the Seine henceforth employed in accordance with orders; 1 but these barbarisms were pregnant with a greater future than the correct Latin of the capital. Perhaps too, if the cantonal constitution in Gaul afterwards appears more closely to approach the Italian urban constitution, and the chief places of the canton as well as the common councils attain a more marked prominence in it than was probably the case in the original Celtic organization; the change may be referred to Caesar. No one probably felt

Thus we read on a semis, which a Vergobretus of the Lexcoll (Lisieux, dep. Calvados) caused to be struck, the following inscription: Chianies Cattos vercobreto; simissos (sic) publicos Lixovio. The chien scarce legible writing and the incredibly wretched stamping of these coins are excellent harmony with their stammering Latin.

more than the political heir of Gaus Gracchus and of Manus, how desirable in a military as well as in a political point of view it would have been to establish a series of Transalpine colonies as bases of support for the new rule and centres of the new civilisation. If nevertheless he confined himself to the settlement of his Celtic or German horsemen in Noviodunum (p. 227) and to that of the Bon in the canton of the Hacdul (p. 227) and the thing of the settlement afterdy rendered quite the services of the settlement of the settlement of the settlement of the services of the settlement of the settlement of the services of the serv in later years for the old Roman province in this respect will be explained in its own place, it is probable that the want of time alone prevented him from extending the same system to the regions which he had recently subdued.

All was over with the Celtic nation. Its political annihilation had been completed by Caesar, its national annihilation was begun and in regular progress. This was no accidental destruction, such as destiny sometimes prepares even for peoples capable of development, but a self meurited and in some measure historically necessary catastrophe. The very course of the last war proves this, whether we view it as a whole or in detail. When the establishment of the foreign rule was in contemplation, only single districts—mostly, moreover, German or half-derman—offered energetic resistance. When the foreign rule was actually established, the attempts to shake it off were either undertaken altogether without judgment, or they were to an undue extent the work of certain prominent nobles, and therefore immediately and entirely brought to an end with the death or capture of an Indutomanus, Camulogenus, Verungstonx, or Correis. The siteges and guernila warfare, in which elsewhere the whole moral depth of national struggles displays itself, were throughout this Celtie struggle of a peculiarily pitiable character. Every page of Celtic history confirms the severe saying of one of the few Romans who had the judgment out to despuse the so-called barbarans—that the Celts boldly challenge danger while future, but lose their courage before its presence. In the mighty vortex of the world's history, which inexorably crushes all peoples that are not as hard and as flexible as steel, such a nation could not permanently maintain itself, with reason the Celts of the continent suffered the same fate at the hands of the Romans, as their kinsmen in Irelian suffer down to our own day at the hands of the Saxons—the fate of becoming merged as a leaven of future development in a politically superior nationality. On the eve of parting from this remarkable nation we may be allowed to call attention to the fact, that in the accounts of the ancients as to the Celts on the Loire and Seine we find almost every one of the characteristic traits which we are accustomed to recognise as marking the Irish. Every feature reappears: the laziness in the culture of the fields; the delight in tippling and brawling; the ostentation—we may recall that sword of Caesar hung up in the sacred grove of the Arvernians after the victory of Gergovia, which its alleged former owner viewed with a smile at the consecrated spot and ordered the sacred property to be carefully spared; the language full of comparisons and hyperboles, of allusions and quaint turns; the droll humour-an excellent example of which was the rule that if any one interrupted a person speaking in public a substantial and very visible hole should be cut, as a measure of police, in the coat of the disturber of the peace; the hearty delight in singing and reciting the deeds of past ages, and the most decided talent for rhetoric and poetry; the curiosity—no trader was allowed to pass, before he had told in the open street what he knew, or did not know, in the shape of news-and the extravagant credulity which acted on such accounts, for which reason in the better regulated cantons travellers were prohibited on pain of severe punishment from communicating unauthenticated reports to others than the public magistrates; the childlike piety, which sees in the priest a father and asks him for his advice in all things; the unsurpassed fervour of national feeling, and the closeness with which those who are fellow-countrymen cling together almost like one family in opposition to the stranger; the inclination to rise in revolt under the first chance leader that presents himself and to form bands, but at the same time the utter incapacity to preserve a self-reliant courage equally remote from presumption and from pusillanimity, to perceive the right time for waiting and for striking, to attain or even barely to tolerate any organisation, any sort of fixed military or political discipline. It is, and remains, at all times and places the same indolent and poetical, irresolute and fervid, inquisitive, credulous, amiable, clever, but —in a political point of view—thoroughly useless nation; and therefore its fate has been always and everywhere the same.

But the fact that this great people was ruined by the Transalpine wars of Caesar was not the most important result of that grand enterprise; far more momentous than the negative was the positive result. It hardly admits of a doubt that, if the rule of the senate bad prolonged its semblance of life for some generations longer, the migration of peoples, as it is called, would have occurred four hundred years sooner than it did, and would have occurred at a time when the Italian civilisation bad not become naturalised either in Gaul, or on the Danube, or in Africa and Spain. Inasmuch as the great general and statesman of Rome with sure glance perceived in the German tribes the rival antagonists of the Romano-Greek world; mas much as with firm hand he established the new system of aggressive defence down even to its details, and taught men to protect the frontiers of the empire by nivers or artificial ramparts, to colonise the nearest barbarian tribes along the frontier with the view of warding off the more remote, and to recruit the Roman army by enlistment from the enemy's country, he gained for the Hellenic-Italian culture the interval necessary to civilise the West just as it had already civilised the East. Ordinary men see the fruits of their action; the seed sown by men of genius germinate slowly Centuries clapsed before men understood that Alexander bad not merely erected an ephemeral kingdom in the East, but had carried Hellenism to . Isia; centuries again elapsed before men understood that Caesar had not merely conquered a new province for the Romans, but had laid the foundation for the Romanising of the regions of the West. It was only a late posterity that perceived the meaning of those expeditions to England and Germany, so inconsiderate in a military point of view, and so barren of immediate result. immense circle of peoples, whose existence and condition to were known barely through the reports-mingling some truth with much fiction—of the manner and the trader, was disclosed by this means to the Greek and Roman world. "Daily," it is said in a Roman writing of May §§, "the letters and messages from Gaul are announcing names of peoples, cantons, and regions hitherto unknown to us." This enlargement of the historical borizon by the expeditions of Carsar beyond the Alps was as much an event in the world's history as the exploring of America by European bands. To the narrow circle of the Mediterranean states were added the peoples of central and northern Europe, the dwellers on the Baltic and North seas; to the old world was added a new one, which thruseforth was influenced by the old and influenced it in turn. What the Gothic Theodoric alterands succeeded in, came very real to being already carned out by Anovatius. Had it so bappered, our civilisation would have hardly stood in any more intimate relation to the Romano-Greek than to the Indian and Assyrian culture. That there is a bridge connecting the past glory of Hellas and Rome with the prouder fabric of modern history; that Western Europe is Romanic, and Germanic Europe classic; that the names of Themistocles and Scipio have to us a very different sound from those of Asoka and Salmanassar; that Homer and Sophocles are not merely like the Vedas and Kalidasa attractive to the literary botanist, but bloom for us in our own garden-all this is the work of Caesar; and, while the creation of his great predecessor in the East has been almost wholly reduced to ruin by the tempests of the Middle Ages, the structure of Caesar has outlasted those thousands of years which have changed religion and polity for the human race and even shifted the centre of civilisation itself, and it stands erect for what we may term perpetuity.

To complete the sketch of the relations of Rome to the peoples of the North at this period, it remains that we cast a glance at the countries which stretch to the north of the Italian and Greek peninsulas; from the sources of the Rhine to the Black Sea. It is true that the torch of history does not illumine the mighty stir and turmoil of peoples which probably prevailed at that time there, and the solitary gleams of light that fall on this region are, like a faint glimmer amidst deep darkness, more fitted to bewilder than to enlighten. But it is the duty of the historian to indicate also the gaps in the record of the history of nations; he may not deem it beneath him to mention, by the side of Caesar's magnificent system of defence, the paltry arrangements by which the generals of the senate professed to protect on this side the frontier of the empire.

North-eastern Italy was still as before (iii. 164) left exposed to the attacks of the Alpine tribes. The strong Roman army encamped at Aquileia in  $\frac{6.9}{5.8}$ , and the triumph of the governor of Cisalpine Gaul, Lucius Afranius, lead us to infer that about this time an expedition to the Alps took place, and it may have been in consequence of this that we find the Romans soon afterwards in closer connection with a king of the Noricans. But that even subsequently Italy was not at all secure on this side, is shown by the sudden assault of the Alpine barbarians on the flourishing town of Tergeste in  $\frac{7.0}{5.2}$ , when the Transalpine insurrection had compelled Caesar to divest upper Italy wholly of troops.

The turbulent peoples also, who had possession of the district along the Illyrian coast, gave their Roman masters constant employment The Dalmatians, even at an earlier period the most considerable people of this region, enlarged their power so much by admitting their neighbours into their union, that the number of their townships rose from twenty to eighty. With respect to the town of Promona (not far fmm the nver Kerka), which they had wrested from the Liburnians and refused to surrender, they fell into a quarrel with the Romans, and defeated the general levy which Caesar called forth against them; a defeat which the outbreak of the civil war prevented him from avenging Partly on this account Dalmatia became in that war a rendezvous of the party hostile to Caesar, and the in-habitants in concert with the Pompeians and with the pirates offered an energetic resistance to the generals of Caesar both by land and by water.

Lastly Macedonia along with Emrus and Hellas lay in greater desolation and decay than almost any other part of the Roman empire Dyrrhachium, Thessalonica, and Byzantium had still some trade and commerce, Athens attracted travellers and students by its name and its philosophical school; but on the whole there lay over the formerly populous little towns of Ifellas, and her seaports once swarming with men, the calm of the grave. But if the Greeks stirred not, the inhabitants of the hardly accessible Macedonian mountains on the other hand continued after the old fashion their predatory raids and feuds, for instance about 1972 . Actolian towns, and a of the Drin overran se did likewise. The D

the Thracians in the Romans in the eight powerful of the Thracian princes, Cotys, the ruler of the old Odryman kingdom, was thenceforth numbered among the chent kings of Rome Nevertheless the pacified land had still as before to suffer invasions from the north and east. The governor Gaius Antonius was severely handled both by the Dardani and by the tribes settled in the modern Dobrudscha, who, with the friends and foes whatever they wished for money. The Thracian Dentheletae (on the Strymon) under his governorship plundered Macedonia far and wide, and even stationed their posts on the great Roman military road leading from Dyrrhachium to Thessalonica; the people in Thessalonica made up their minds to stand a siege from them, for the strong Roman army in the province seemed to be present only as an onlooker while the inhabitants of the mountains and the neighbouring peoples levied contributions from the peaceful subjects of Rome.

managed matters; which was no wonder, seeing that he gave

Such attacks could not indeed endanger the power of Rome, and a fresh disgrace had long ago ceased to occasion concern. But just about this period a people began to acquire political consolidation beyond the Danube in the wide Dacian steppesa people which seemed destined to play a different part in history from that of the Bessi and the Dentheletae. Among the Getae or Dacians in primeval times there had been associated with the king of the people a holy man called Zamolxis, who, after having explored the ways and wonders of the gods in distant travel in foreign lands, and having thoroughly studied in particular the wisdom of the Egyptian priests and of the Greek Pythagoreans, had returned to his native country to end his life as a pious hermit in a cavern of the "holy mountain." He remained accessible only to the king and his servants, and gave forth to the king and through him to the people his oracles with reference to every important undertaking. He was regarded by his countrymen at first as priest of the supreme god and ultimately as himself a god, just as it is said of Moses and Aaron that the Lord had made Aaron the prophet and Moses the god of the prophet. This had become a permanent institution; there was regularly associated with the king of the Getae such a god, from whose mouth everything which the king ordered proceeded or appeared to proceed. This peculiar constitution, in which the theocratic idea had become subservient to the apparently absolute power of the king, probably gave to the kings of the Getae some such position with respect to their subjects as the caliphs had with respect to the Arabs; and one result of it was the marvellous religious-political reform of the nation, which was carried out about this time by the king of the Getae, Boerebistas, and the god Dekaeneos. The people, which had morally and politically fallen into utter decay through unexampled drunkenness, was as it were metamorphosed by the new gospel of temperance and valour; with his bands under the influence, so to speak, of puritanic discipline and enthusiasm king Boerebistas founded fitted to contend with gods.

274

within a few years a mighty kingdom, which extended along both banks of the Danube and reached southward far into Thrace, Illyria, and Noricum. No direct contact with the Romans had yet taken place, and no one could tell what might come out of this singular state, which reminds us of the early times of Islam, but this much it needed no prophetic gift to forteell, that proconsuls like Antonins and Piso were nowise

CHAPTER VIII

THE JOINT RULE OF POMPEIUS AND CAESAR

Among the democratic chiefs, who from the time of the consulate of Caesar were recognised officially, so to speak, as the joint rulers of the commonwealth, as the governing "triumvirs," Pompeius in public opinion occupied decidedly the first place. It was he who was called by the Optimates the "private dictator;" it was before him that Cicero prostrated himself in vain; against him were directed the sharpest sarcasms in the placards of Bibulus, and the most envenomed arrows of the conversation in the saloons of the opposition. This was only to be expected. According to the facts before the public Pompeius was indisputably the first general of his time; Caesar was a dexterous party leader and party orator, of undeniable talents, but as notoriously of unwarlike, and indeed of effeminate temperament. Such opinions had been long current; it could not be expected of the rabble in high quarters, that they should trouble themselves about the real state of things and abandon platitudes once established because of some obscure feats of heroism on the Caesar evidently played in the league the mere part of the adjutant who executed for his chief the work which Flavius, Afranius, and other less capable instruments had attempted and not performed. It seemed as if even his governorship could not alter this state of things. Afranius had only recently occupied a very similar position, without thereby acquiring any special importance; several provinces at once had been of late years repeatedly placed under one governor, and often far more than four legions had been united in one hand; as matters were again quiet beyond the Alps and prince Ariovistus was recognised by the Romans as a friend and neighbour, there was no prospect of conducting a war of any moment there. It was natural to compare the position which Pompeius had obtained by the Gabinio-Manilian law with that which Caesar had obtained by the Vatinian; but the comparison did not turn out to Caesar's advantage. Pompeius ruled over nearly the whole Roman empire; Caesar over two provinces. Pompeius had the soldiers and the treasures of the state almost absolutely at his nor is it of any moment to unumerate all the deeds of murder, besiegings of houses, acts of incendiarism, and other scenes of violence within a great capital, and to rection up how often the scale was traversed from hissing and shouting to spitting on and trampling down opponents, and thence to throwing stones and drawing swords.

The principal performer in this theatre of political rascality was that Publius Clodius, of whose services, as already mentioned (p. 194), the regents availed themselves against Cato and Cicero. Left to himself, this influential, talented, energetic, and—in his trade—really exemplary partisan pursued during which were nothing else than a formal organisation-subdivided according to the streets, and with an almost military arrangement-of the whole free or slave proletariate of the capital. If in addition the further law, which Clodius had likewise already projected and purposed to introduce when practor in '17'. should give to freedmen and to slaves living in defacto possession of freedom the same political rights with the freeborn, the author of all these brave improvements of the constitution might declare his work complete, and as a second Nums of freedom and equality might invite the sweet rabble of the capital to see hun celebrate high mass in honour of the arrival of the democratic millennium in the temple of Liberty which he had erected on the site of one of his burnings at the Palatine. Of course these exertions in behalf of freedom did not exclude a traffic in decrees of the burgesses; like Caesar himself, Caesar's ape kept governor. ships and other posts great and small on sale for the benefit of his fellow-citizens, and sold the sovereign rights of the state for the benefit of subject kings and cities.

formalities, set aside the limits which had shortly before 4293

formalities, set aside the limits which had shortly before (749),

At all these things Pompeius looked on without stirring. It he did not perceive how seriously he thus compromited harriell, his opponent perceived it. Clodius had the hardshood to magge in a dispute with the treent of Rome on a question of attle moment, as to the sending back of a captive American prince; and the variance soon became a formal fend, in which the utter helplessness of Pompeius was displayed. The head of the state knew not how to encounter the partisan otherwise than with his own weapons, only wielded with far less dexterity. If he had been tricked by Clodius respecting the Armenian prince, he offended him in turn by releasing Cicero, who was pre-eminently obnoxious to Clodius, from the exile into which Clodius had sent him; and he attained his object so thoroughly, that he converted his opponent into an implacable foe. If Clodius made the streets insecure with his bands, the victorious general likewise set slaves and pugilists to work; in the frays which ensued the general naturally was worsted by the demagogue and defeated in the streets, and Gaius Cato was kept almost constantly under siege in his garden by Clodius and his comrades. It is not the least remarkable feature in this remarkable spectacle, that the regent and the rogue amidst their quarrel vied in courting the favour of the fallen government; Pompeius, partly to please the senate, permitted Cicero's recall, Clodius on the other hand declared the Julian laws null and void, and called on Marcus Bibulus publicly to testify to their having been unconstitutionally passed.

Naturally no positive result could issue from this imbroglio of dark passions; its most distinctive character was just its utterly ludicrous want of object. Even a man of Caesar's genius had to learn by experience that democratic agitation was completely worn out, and that even the way to the throne lay no longer through demagogism. It was nothing more than an historical makeshift, if now, in the interregnum between republic and monarchy, some whimsical fellow dressed himself out with the prophet's mantle and staff which Caesar had long laid aside, and the great ideals of Gaius Gracchus came once more upon the stage distorted into a parody; the so-called party from which this democratic agitation proceeded was so little such in reality. that afterwards it had no part at all allotted to it in the decisive struggle. It cannot even be asserted that by means of this anarchical state of things the desire after a strong government based on military power had been vividly kindled in the minds of those who were indifferent to politics. Even apart from the fact that such neutral burgesses were chiefly to be sought outside of Rome, and thus were not directly affected by the rioting in the capital, those minds which could be at all influenced by such motives had been already by their former experience, and especially by the Catilinarian conspiracy, thoroughly converted to the principle of authority; but those that were really alarmed were affected far more emphatically by a dread of the grantic criss inseparable from an overthrow of the constitution, than by dread of the mere continuance of the—at bottom withal very superficial—anarchy in the capital. The only result of it which historically deserves notice was the painful position in which Pompeius was placed by the attacks of the Clodians, and which had a material share in determining his farther steps. Little as Pompeius liked and understood taking the initiative, he was yet on this occasion compelled by the change of his position towards both Clodius and Caesar to depart from his previous maction. The irksome and disgraceful situation to which Clodius had reduced him, could not but at length arouse even his sluggish nature to hatred and anger. But far more important was the change which took place in his relation to Caesar While, of the two confederate regents, Pompeius had utterly failed in the functions which he had undertaken, Caesar had the skill to turn his official position to an account which left all calculations and all fears far behind inquiry as to permission, Caesar had doubled bis army by levies in his southern province inhabited in great measure by Roman burgesses, had with this army crossed the Alps instead of keeping watch over Rome from Northern Italy, had crushed in the bud a new Cimbrian invasion, and within two years (534, 537) had carried the Roman arms to the Rhine and the Channel In presence of such facts even the anstocratic tactics of ignoring and disparaging were baffled. He who had often been scoffed at as effeminate was now the idol of the army, the celebrated victory-crowned hero, whose fresh laurels outshone the faded laurels of Pompeius, and to whom even the sena'e as early as seconded the demonstrations of honour usual after successful campaigns in richer measure than had ever fallen to the share of Pompeius. Pompeius stood towards his former adjutant precisely as after the Gabinio-Manilan laws the latter had stood towards him Caesar was now the hero of the day and the master of the most powerful Roman army; Pompeius was an ex-general who had once been famous. It is true that no collision had yet occurred between father in law and son in law, and their relation was externally undisturbed, but every political alliance is inwardly broken up wien the relative proportions of the power of the parties are materially altered While the quarrel with Clodius was merely annoying, the change in the position of Caesar involved a very serious danger for Pompeius, just as Caesar and his confederates had formerly sought a military support against him, he found himself now compelled to seek a military support against Caesar, and laying aside his haughty privacy to come forward as a candidate for some extraordinary magistracy, which would enable him to hold his place by the side of the governor of the two Gauls with equal, and, if possible, with superior power. His tactics, like his position, were exactly those of Caesar during the Mithradatic war. To balance the military power of a superior but still remote adversary by the obtaining of a similar command, Pompeius required in the first instance the official machinery of government. A year and a half ago this had been absolutely at his disposal. The regents then ruled the state both by the comitia, which absolutely obeyed them as the masters of the street, and by the senate, which was energetically overawed by Caesar; as representative of the coalition in Rome and as its acknowledged head, Pompeius would have doubtless obtained from the senate and from the burgesses any decree which he wished, even if it were against Caesar's interest. But by the awkward quarrel with Clodius, Pompeius had lost the command of the streets, and could not expect to carry a proposal in his favour in the popular assembly. Things were not quite so unfavourable for him in the senate; but even there it was doubtful whether Pompeius after that long and fatal inaction still held the reins of the majority firmly enough in hand to procure such a decree as he required.

The position of the senate also, or rather of the nobility generally, had meanwhile undergone a change. From the very fact of its complete abasement it drew fresh energy. In the coalition of of various things had been revealed which were by no means ripe for the light. The banishment of Cato and Cicero—which public opinion, however much the regents kept themselves in the background and even professed to lament it, referred with unerring tact to its real authors—and the marriagerelationship formed between Caesar and Pompeius suggested to men's minds with disagreeable clearness monarchical decrees of banishment and family alliances. The larger public too, which stood more aloof from political events, observed the foundations of the future monarchy coming more and more distinctly into view. From the moment when the public perceived that Caesar's object was not a modification of the republican constitution, but that the question at stake was the existence or non-existence of the republic, many of the best men. who had hitherto reckoned themselves of the popular party and honoured in Caesar its head, must infallibly have passed over to the opposite side. It was no longer in the saloons and the country houses of the governing nobility alone that men talked of the "three dynasts," of the "three-headed monster." The dense crowds of people listened to the consular orations of Caesar without a sound of acclamation or approval; not a hand surred to applaud when the democratic consul entered the theatre. But they hissed when one of the tools of the regent showed himself in public, and even stand men applauded when an actor uttered an anti-monarchic sentence or an alliuson dropped hints, that through such opposition the equites might easily lose their new special places in the theatre, and the commons their bread-corn; people were therefore somewhat more guarded perhaps in the expression of their displeasure, but the feeling remained the same. The lever of material interests was applied with better success. Caesar's gold flowed in streams. Men of seeming nehes whose finances were in disorder, influential ladies who were in pecuniary embarrassment, insolvent young nobles, merchants and bankers in difficulties, either went in person to Gaul with the view of drawing from the fountain head, or applied to Caesar's agents in the capital; and rarely was any man outwardly respectable-Caesat avoided dealings with vagabonds who were utterly lost-rejected in either quarter. To this fell to be added the enormous buildings which Caesar caused to be executed on his account in the capital-and hy which a countless number of men of all ranks from the consular down to the common porter found opportunity of profiting-as well as the immense sums expended for public amusements. Pompeius did the same on a more limited scale;

direct party agitation, especially the country towns, were inclined towards monarchy or even ready to submit to it.

If Rome had had a representative constitution, the discontent of the burgesses would have found its natural expression in the elections, and have increased by so expressing itself; under the existing circumstances nothing was left for those true to the constitution but to place themselves under the senate, which, degraded as it was, still appeared the representative and champion of the legitimate republic. Thus it happened that the senate, now when it had been overthrown, suddenly found at its disposal an army far more considerable and far more earnestly faithful; than when in its power and splendour it overthrew the Gracchi and under the protection of Sulla's sword restored the state. The aristocracy felt this; it began to bestir itself afresh. Tust at this time Marcus Cicero, after having bound himself to join the obsequious party in the senate and not only to offer no opposition, but to work with all his might for the regents, had obtained from them permission to return. Although Pompeius in this matter only made an incidental concession to the oligarchy, and intended first of all to play a trick on Clodius, and secondly to acquire in the fluent consular a tool rendered pliant by sufficient blows, the opportunity afforded by the return of Cicero was embraced for republican demonstrations, just as his banishment had been a demonstration against the senate. With all possible solemnity, protected moreover against the Clodians by the band of Titus Annius Milo, the two consuls, following out a resolution of the senate, submitted a proposal to the burgesses to permit the return of the consular Cicero, and the senate called on all burgesses true to the constitution not to be absent from the vote. An unusual number of worthy men, especially from the country towns, actually assembled in Rome on the day of voting (4th August 57). The journey of the consular from Brundisium to the capital gave occasion to a series of similar, not less brilliant, manifestations of public feeling. The new alliance between the senate and the burgesses faithful to the constitution was on this occasion as it were publicly proclaimed, and a sort of review of the latter was held, the singularly favourable result of which contributed not a little to revive the sunken courage of the aristocracy.

The helplessness of Pompeius in presence of these daring demonstrations as well as the undignified and almost ridiculous position into which he had fallen with reference to Clodius, deprived him and the coalition of their credit; and the section of the senate which adhered to the regents, demoralised by the singular inaptitude of Pompeius and belplessly left to itself, could not prevent the republican-aristocratic party from reguining completely the ascendancy in the corporation. The game of this party really at that time-and-was still by no means desperate for a courageous and dexterous player. It had now -what it had not possessed for a century past-a firm support in the people; if it trusted the people and itself, it might attain its object in the shortest and most honourable way. Why not attack the regents openly and avowedly? Why should not a . . . . .

ing? It was possible perhaps in this way once more to restore the rule of the senate. Certainly the republicans would thus play a bold game; but perhaps in this case, as often, the most courageous

most pruder

period was

There was however another way perhaps more sure, at any rate better adapted to the character and nature of these constitutionalists; they might labour to set the two regents at variance and through this variance to attain ultimately to the helm themselves. The relations between the two men ruling the state had become altered and relaxed, now that Caesar had acquired a standing of preponderant power by the side of Pompeius and had compelled the latter to canvass for a new position of command; it was probable that, if he obtained it, there would arise in one way or other a rupture and struggle between them. If Pompeius remained unsupported in this, his defeat was scarcely doubtful, and the constitutional party would in that event find themselves after the close of the conflict under the rule of one master instead of two. But if the nobility employed against Caesar the same means by which the latter had won his previous victories, and entered into alliance with the weaker competitor, victory would probably, with a general like Pumperal, and with an army such as that of the constitutionalists, fall to the coalition; and to settle matters with Pompous after the victory could not-judging from the proofs of political incapacity which he had already given-appear a special/ deficult task.

Things had taken such a turn as naturally to suggest an understanding between Pompeius and the republican party. Gaul An aristocratic restoration was at work, and with the attack on the colony of Capua the nobility threw down the gauntlet to the regents

Caesar, although receiving from day to day detailed accounts of the events in the capital and, whenever military considerations allowed, watching their progress from as near a point of his southern province as possible, had not hitherto, visibly at least, interfered in them. But now war had been declared against him as well as his colleague, in fact against him especially he was compelled to act, and he acted quickly. He happened to be in the very neighbourhood, the aristocracy had not ever found it advisable to delay the rupture, till he should have again crossed the Alps. In the beginning of April % Crassus left the capital, to concert the necessary measures with his more rowerful colleague, he found Caesar in Ratenna. Thence

Sardinia and Africa 1110 1 00 such as Metellus Nepos the proconsul of Hither Spain, 4 pp -5 Claudius the propractor of Sardinia, and many others, followed them, a hundred and twenty lictors and upwards of two hundred senators were counted at this conference, where already the new monarchical senate was represented in contradistinction to the republican In every respect the decisive voice lay with Caesar He used it to re-establish and consolidate the existing joint rule on a new basis of more equal distribution of power The governorships of most importance in a military point of trien, next to that of the two Gauls, were assigned to his two colleagues-that of the two Spains to Pompeius, that of Syria to Crussus, and these offices were to be secured to them by decree of the people for five years (100 = 104), and to be suitably provided for in a military and financial point of view On the other hand Caesar stipulated for the prolongation of his com mand, which expired with the year 30, to the close of 45, as well as for the prerogative of increasing his legions to ten ar of charging the pay for the troops arbitrarily levied by him on the state-chest Pompenis and Crassus were moreover povmuced a second consulship for the next year (***) before they departed for their governorships, while Larsar kep' it open to himself to administer the supreme magistracy a second time af er the termination of his governorship in the when the ten years' interval legally requisite between two consult pi should have in his case elapsed. The military support, which Pompeius and Crassus required for regulating the affairs of the capital all the more that the legions of Caesar originally destined for this purpose could not now be withdrawn from Transalpine Gaul, was to be found in new legions, which they were to raise for the Spanish and Syrian armies and were not to despatch from Italy to their several destinations until it should seem to themselves to be convenient. The main questions were thus settled; subordinate matters, such as the settlement of the tactics to be followed against the opposition in the capital, the regulation of the candidatures for the ensuing years, and the like, did not long detain them. The great master of mediation composed the personal differences which stood in the way of an agreement with his wonted ease, and compelled the most refractory elements to act in concert. An understanding befitting colleagues was restored, externally at least, between Pompeius and Crassus. Even Publius Clodius was induced to keep himself and his pack quiet, and to give no farther annoyance to Pompeius-not the least marvellous feat of the mighty magician.

That this whole settlement of the pending questions proceeded, not from a compromise among independent and rival regents meeting on equal terms, but solely from the good will of Caesar, is evident from the circumstances. Pompeius appeared at Luca in the painful position of a powerless refugee, who comes to ask aid from his opponent. Whether Caesar chose to dismiss him and to declare the coalition dissolved, or to receive him and to let the league continue just as it stood-Pompeius was in either view politically annihilated. If he did not in this case break with Caesar, he became the powerless client of his confederate. If again he did break with Caesar and, which was not very probable, effected even now a coalition with the aristocracy, this alliance between opponents, concluded under pressure of necessity and at the last moment, was so little formidable that it was hardly for the sake of averting it that Caesar agreed to those concessions. A serious rivalry on the part of Crassus with Caesar was utterly impossible. difficult to say what motives induced Caesar to surrender without necessity his superior position, and now voluntarily to concede-what he had refused to his rival even on the conclusion of the league of 694, and what the latter had since, with the evident design of being armed against Caesar, vainly striven in different ways to attain without, nay against, Caesar's will-

the second consulate and multary power. Certainly it was not Pompeius alone that was placed at the head of an army, but also his old enemy and Caesar's ally throughout many years, Crassus; and undoubtedly Crassus obtained his respectable military position merely as a counterpoise to the new power of Pompeius Nevertheless Caesar was a great loser, when his rival exchanged his former powerlessness for an important command. It is possible that Caesar did not yet feel himself sufficiently master of his soldiers to lead them with confidence to warfare against the formal authorities of the land, and was therefore anxious not to be forced to civil war now by being recalled from Gaul, but whether civil war should arise or not depended at the moment far more on the anstocracy of the capital than on Pompeius, and this would have been at most a reason for Caesar not breaking openly with Pompeius, so that the opposition might not be emboldened by the rupture, but not a reason for conceding to him what he did concede. Purely personal motives may have contributed to the result, it may be that Caesar recollected how he had once stood in a position of similar powerlessness in presence of Pompeius, and had licen saved from destruction only by his-pusillanimous, it is true, rather than magnanimous-retirement; it is probable that Caesar hesitated to break the heart of his beloved daughter who was sincerely attached to her husband-in his soul there was room for much besides the statesman. But the decisive reason was doubtless the consideration of Gaul Carsardiffering from his biographets—regarded the subjugation of Gaul not as an incidental enterprise useful to him for the gain ng of the crown, but as one on which depended the external security and the internal reorganisation, in a word the future, of his superiority over his rivals and granted to Pompeias sutter a power to settle matters with the senate and its adherents. This was a grave political blunder, it Caesar had no other object than to become as que kly as possible larg of Rerieg but the ambition of that rare man was not confined to the value and of a crown. In had the boldness to prosecute side by side, and to complete, two labours equally wast—the actiferent of the internal affairs of Italy, and the acquisition and securing of a row and firsh soil for Italian cruitasts of. These trials of course interfered with each other; his Gallic conquests hadered much more than helped him on his way to the throne. It yielded him bitter fruit, that he postponed the Italian revolution to  $\frac{706}{48}$  instead of settling it in  $\frac{60}{36}$ . But as a statesman as well as a general Caesar was a peculiarly daring player, who, confiding in himself and despising his opponents, gave them always great and sometimes extravagant odds.

It was now therefore the turn of the aristocracy to make good their high gage, and to wage war as boldly as they had boldly declared it. But there is no more pitiable spectacle than when cowardly men have the misfortune to take a bold resolution. They had simply exercised no foresight at all. It seemed to have occurred to nobody that Caesar would possibly stand on his defence, or that even now Pompeius and Crassus might combine with him afresh and more closely than ever. This seems incredible; but it becomes intelligible when we glance at the persons who then led the constitutionalist opposition in the senate. Cato was still absent; the most influential man in the senate at this time was Marcus Bibulus, the hero of passive resistance, the most obstinate and most stupid of all consulars. They had taken up arms only to lay them down, so soon as the adversary merely put his hand to the sheath; the bare news of the conferences of Luca sufficed to suppress all thought of a serious opposition and to bring the mass of the timid—that is, the immense majority of the senate—back to their duty as subjects, which in an unhappy hour they had abandoned. There was no further talk of the appointed discussion to try the validity of the Julian laws; the legions raised by Caesar on his own behalf were charged by decree of the senate on the public chest; the attempts on occasion of regulating the next consular provinces to take away both Gauls or one of them by decree from Caesar were rejected by the majority (end of May  $^{c,0.6}_{r,c}$ ). Thus the corporation did public penance. Secretly the lords, one after another, thoroughly frightened at their own temerity, came to make their peace and vow unconditional obediencenone more quickly than Marcus Cicero, who repented too late of his perfidy, and with reference to the most recent period of his life applied to himself epithets which were altogether more appropriate than flattering. Of course the regents agreed to be pacified; they refused nobody pardon, for there was nobody who was worth the trouble of making him an exception. That we may see how suddenly the tone in aristocratic circles changed after:

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cato was not yet in Romc when Cicero spoke on 11th March  $\frac{698}{56}$  in favour of Sestius (Pro Sest. 28, 60) and when the discussion took place in the senate in consequence of the resolutions of Luca respecting Cacsar's legions (Plut. Caes. 21); it is not till the discussions at the beginning of  $\frac{699}{56}$  that we find him once more busy, and, as he travelled in winter (Plut. Cato Min. 38), he must have returned to Rome in the end of  $\frac{698}{56}$ . He cannot therefore, as has been mistakenly inferred from Asconius (p. 35, 53), have defended Milo in February  $\frac{698}{56}$ .

obtained practically a garmon aithough not assembled in arms, and one of the regents as commandant. Of the troops levied for Syria and Spain by Crassus and Pompeius, thase destined for the East no doubt took their departure; but Pempeius caused the two Spanish provinces to be administred by his lieutenants with the garrison hitherto stationed there, while he dismissed the officers and soldiers of the legions which wern newly raised—nominally for despatch to Spain—on furforgh.

and remained himself with them in Italy.

Doubtless the tacit opposition of public opinion increased, the more clearly and generally men perceived that the regents were working to put an end to the old constitution and with as much gentleness as possible to accommodate the existing condition of the government and administration to the formation of the government and administration to the formation of the government and administration to the formation of the properties of all, all the more important affairs, and were disposed of without consulting the senate, sometimes by decree of the people, sometimes by the mer root pleasure of the rulers. The arrangements agreed on at Luca respecting the military command of Gaul were submitted rectifut to the burgesses by Crassus and Pompeius, those relitare 12 Spain and Syria by the tribune of the people Gaus Trebonat

Mr assume greatment future (Ad. R. 10. 5.)).
This palinode is the still extant oration on the Provinces to be assigned to the consult of $\frac{1}{2}$. It was delivered in the end of Mry $\frac{3}{2}$. The pose contrasting with it are the orations for hesites and against Venture 4.

1. The province of the Exercise with high province of the Exercise with a contrast of the Exercise with a few and the terminal provinces of the Exercise with a few contrast of the terminal provinces of the Exercise with a few contrast of the terminal provinces of the Exercise with the provinces with the provinces of the Exercise with the provinces with the preservation with the provinces with the provinces with the provinc

impel ecutrore (AA AE

and in other instances the more important governorships were frequently filled up by decree of the people. That the regents did not need the consent of the authorities to increase their troops at pleasure, Caesar had already sufficiently shown: as little did they hesitate mutually to borrow troops; Caesar for instance received such collegiate support from Pompeius for the Gallic, and Crassus from Caesar for the Parthian, war. The Transpadanes, who possessed according to the existing constitution only Latin rights, were treated by Caesar during his administration practically as full burgesses of Rome. While formerly the organisation of newly-acquired territories had been managed by a senatorial commission, Caesar organised his extensive Gallic conquests altogether according to his own judgment, and founded, for instance, without having received any farther powers burgess-colonies, particularly Novum-Comum (Como) with five thousand colonists. Piso conducted the Thracian, Gabinius the Egyptian, Crassus the Parthian war, without consulting the senate, and even without reporting, as was usual, to that body; in like manner triumphs and other marks of honour were accorded and carried out without the senate being asked about them. Obviously this did not arise from a mere neglect of forms, which would be the less intelligible, seeing that in the great majority of cases no opposition from

This is not stated by our authorities. But the view that Caesar levied no soldiers at all from the Latin communities, that is to say from by far the greater part of his province, is in itself utterly incredible, and is directly refuted by the fact that the opposition party slightingly designates the force levied by Caesar as "for the most part natives of the Transpadane colonies" (Caes. B. C. iii. 87); for here the Latin colonies of Strabo (Ascon. in Pison. p. 3; Sueton. Caes. 8) are evidently meant. Yet there is no trace of Latin cohorts in Caesar's Gallic army; on the contrary according to his express statements all the recruits levied by him in Cisalpine Gaul were added to the legions or distributed into legions. It is possible that Caesar combined with the levy the bestowal of the franchise; but more probably he adhered in this matter to the standpoint of his party, which instead of seeking to procure for the Transpadanes the Roman franchise rather regarded it as already legally belonging to them (p. 149). Only thus could the report spread, that Caesar had introduced of his own authority the Roman municipal constitution among the Transpadane communities (Cic. Ad Att. v. 3, 2; Ad Fam. viii. 1, 2). This hypothesis too explains why Hirtius designates the Transpadane towns as "colonies of Roman burgesses" (B. G. viii. 24), and why Caesar treated the colony of Comum founded by him as a burgess-colony (Sucton. Caes. 28; Strabo, v. 1, p. 213; Plutarch, Caes. 29) while the moderate party of the aristocracy conceded to it only the same rights as to the other Transpadane colonies, viz. Latin rights, and the ultras even declared the civic rights conferred on the settlers as altogether null, and consequently did not concede to the Comenses the privileges attached to the holding of a Latin municipal magistracy (Cic. Ad Att. v. 11, 2; Appian, B. C. ii. 26).

the senate was to be expected. On the contrary, it was a wellcalculated design to dislodge the senate from the domain of military arrangements and higher politics, and to restrict its senatorial decrees and emminal actions. While the regents thus in the main set aside the senate, they still made some use of the less dangerous popular assemblies-care was taken that in these the lords of the street should put no farther difficulty in the way of the lords of the state; in many cases however they dispensed with this empty shadow, and employed without duguise autocratic forms

The humbled senate had to submit to its position whether it would or not. The leader of the compliant majority continued to be Marcus Cicero He was useful on account of his laws er's talent of finding reasons, or at any rate words, for everything; and there was a genuine Caesanan irony in employing the man, by means of whom mainly the anstocracy had conducted their demonstrations against the regents, as the mouthpiece of servility. Accordingly they pardoned him for his brief device to kick against the pricks, not however without having previously assured themselves of his submissiveness in every way. His brother had been obliged to take the position of an officer in the Gallie army to answer in some measure as a hostage for him; had compelled Cicero himself to accept a l'eutenant.

under him, which furnished a handle for politely him at any moment. Clodius had certainly leer "ructed to leave him meanwhile at peace, but Caesar as little threw off Clodius on account of Geera at he threw off Circo on account of Clodius; and the great swiour of his country and the no less great hero of liberty entered into an antechan'er rivalry in the head quarters of Samerohma, for the lufter ag illustration of which there lacked, unfortunately, a Reman Anstophanes. But not only was the same rod kept in suspense over Cicero's head, which had once already descended on 1 '2 so severely; golden fetters were also laid upon har Arridst the serious embarrassment of his fnances the loans of Cartar free of interest, and the joint overseership of three builders which occasioned the circulation of enormous same in the capital, were in a high degree welcome to bin; and many an irem mal oration for the senate was urpped in the bad by the thought that the agent of Caesar might present a bill to him after the close of the sitting. Consequently he vowed "in future to ask no more after right and honour, but to strive for the favour of the regents," and "to be as flexible as an ear-lap." They used him accordingly as—what he was good for—an advocate; in which capacity it was on various occasions his lot to be obliged to defend his very bitterest foes at a higher bidding, and that especially in the senate, where he almost regularly served as the organ of the dynasts and submitted the proposals "to which others probably consented, but not he himself;" indeed, as recognised leader of the majority of the compliant, he obtained even a certain political importance. They dealt with the other members of the governing corporation accessible to fear, flattery, or gold in the same way as they had dealt with Cicero, and succeeded in keeping it on the whole in subordination.

Certainly there remained a section of their opponents, who at least kept to their colours and were neither to be terrified nor to be won. The regents had become convinced that exceptional measures, such as those against Cato and Cicero, did their cause more harm than good, and that it was a lesser evil to tolerate an unpleasant republican opposition than to convert their opponents into martyrs for the republic. Therefore they allowed Cato to return (end of  $\frac{698}{66}$ ) and thenceforward in the senate and in the Forum, often at the peril of his life, to offer a continued opposition to the regents, which was doubtless deserving of honour, but unhappily was at the same time ridiculous. They allowed him on occasion of the proposals of Trebonius to push matters once more to a hand-to-hand conflict in the Forum, and to submit to the senate a proposal that the proconsul Caesar should be given over to the Usipetes and Tencteri on account of his perfidious conduct towards those barbarians (p. 239). They were patient when Marcus Favonius, Cato's Sancho, after the senate had adopted the resolution to charge the legions of Caesar on the state-chest, sprang to the door of the senate-house and proclaimed to the streets the danger of the country; when the same person in his scurrilous fashion called the white bandage, which Pompeius wore round his weak leg, a misplaced diadem; when the consular Lentulus Marcellinus, on being applauded, called out to the assembly to make diligent use of this privilege of expressing their opinion while they were still allowed to do so; when the tribune of the people Gaius Ateius Capito consigned Crassus on his departure for Syria, with all the formalities of the theology of the day, publicly to the evil spirits. These were, on the whole, vain demonstrations of an irritated minority; yet the little party from which they issued was so far of importance, that it on the one hand fostered and gave the watchword to the republican opposition fermenting in secret, and on the other hand sometimes dragged the majority of the senate, which withal cherished at bottom quite the same sentiments with reference to the regents, into isolated decrees directed against them. For even the majority felt the need of giving vent, at least sometimes and in subordinate matters to their suppressed indignation, and especially-after the manner of those who are servile with reluctance-of exhibiting their resentment towards the great foes in rage against the small. Wherever it was possible, a gentle blow was administered to the instruments of the regents; thus Gabinius was refused the thanksgiving-festival that he asked ( thus Piso was recalled from his province; thus mourning was put on by the senate, when the inbune of the people Gaius Cato hindered the elections for the as long as the consul Marcellinus belonging to the constitutional party was in office. Even Cicero, however humbly he always bowed the recents, usued an equally encouned and inspid of the senate and the m--now only the more clearly -d from the senate to the ne burgesses to the senate, regents as it formerly passes ... ie burgeses to the senate, an complained, "is of the slightest action." the thre; the regents are all-powerful, and they take care that co one shall remain in doubt about it; the whole state is virtually the regents are an powerful, and they take that it is ritually transformed and obeys the dictators; our generation will eat like to see a change of things." They were living in far to lorger under the republic, but under morarthy.

But if the guidance of the state was at the absolute dupinal of the regents, there remained still a political dimain separated in some measure from the government prince, which it was more easy to defend and more difficult to compact; that of the ordinary elections of magnitrates, and of the jaryevents. That leater, although not coming directly under politics, are greatly influenced everywhere, and were so above all or kere, by the spirit that rules state-affairs, is of two clear. The elections of magnitrates certainly belonged by tight to the government proper of the state; but, as at this period the state was administered substantially by extraordinary magistrates or by men wholly without title, and even the supreme ordinary magistrates, if they belonged to the anti-monarchical party, could not in any tangible way influence the state-machinery, the ordinary magistrates sank more and more into mere puppets -as, in fact, even those of them who were most disposed to opposition described themselves frankly and with entire justice as powerless ciphers—and their elections therefore sank into mere demonstrations. Thus, after the opposition had already been wholly dislodged from the proper field of battle, hostilities might nevertheless becontinued in that of elections and processes. The regents spared no pains to remain victors also in this field. As to the elections, they had already at Luca settled between themselves the lists of candidates for the next years, and they left no means untried to carry the candidates agreed upon there. They expended their gold primarily for the purpose of influencing the elections. A great number of soldiers were dismissed annually on furlough from the armies of Caesar and Pompeius to take part in the voting of Rome. Caesar was wont himself to guide, and watch over, the election movements from as near a point as possible of Upper Italy. Yet the object was but very imperfectly attained. For  $\frac{699}{66}$  no doubt Pompeius and Crassus were elected consuls, agreeably to the convention of Luca, and Lucius Domitius, the only candidate of the opposition who persevered, was set aside; but this had been effected only by open violence, on which occasion Cato was wounded and other extremely scandalous incidents occurred. In the next consular elections for  $\frac{700}{64}$ , in spite of all the exertions of the regents, Domitius was actually elected, and Cato likewise now prevailed in the candidature for the practorship, in which to the scandal of the whole burgesses Caesar's client Vatinius had during the previous year beaten him off the field. At the elections for  $\frac{701}{63}$ the opposition succeeded in so indisputably convicting the candidates of the regents along with others of the most shameful electioneering intrigues that the regents, on whom the scandal recoiled, could not do otherwise than abandon them. These repeated and severe defeats of the dynasts on the battle-field of the elections may be traceable in part to the unmanageableness of the rusty machinery, to the incalculable accidents of the polling, to the opposition at heart of the middle classes, to the various private considerations that interfere in such cases and often strangely clash with those of party; but the main cause lies elsewhere. The elections were at this time essentially in the power of the different clubs into which the anistocracy had grouped themselves, the system of bribery was organised by them on the most extensive scale and with the utmost method The same aristocracy therefore, which was represented in the senate, ruled the elections, but while in the senate it yielded with a grudge, it worked and voted here-in secret and secure from all reckoning-absolutely against the regents. That the influence of the nobility in this field was by no means broken

of the succeeding years

The jury-courts occasioned equally great difficulty to the regents. As they were then composed, while the senatorial nobility was here also influential, the decisive voice lar chefr with the middle class. The fixing of a high rated crass i ? jurymen by a law proposed by Pompeius in " is a remarkable proof that the opposition to the regents had its chief seat in the middle class properly so called, and that the great capital sta showed themselves here, as everywhere, more complant than the latter Nevertheless the republican parts was not yet deposed of all hold in the courts, and it was never wear, of directors, political impeachments, not indeed against the regents them selves, but against their prominent instruments. This warfare of prosecutions was waged the more Leenly, that according to the duty of accusation belonged to the senatorial year. and, as may readily be conceived there was trove of republican passion, fresh talent, and bold delight in attack to be f -1 among these youths than among the older members of the order Certainly the courts were not free, if the ream't were in enmest, the courts ventured as little as the senate to refa e obedience. None of their antagonists were innecuted by the opposition with such hatred—to furrous that it about passed into a proverb—as Vatrius, by far the more a farrier and unscrupaious of the closer adherents of Carrar, tx ' } . master gave the command, and he was acquired in al 21 c processes raised against him. Hut impeachments by men we have who wild the sword of chalecters and the first of same casm as did Gains Lucinius Calves and Gains Ach all to eld not mus their mark even when they fat ed, but were to asta successes wanting. They were mostly, no dicht chits of over subordmate individuals, but even on of the hillings and most hated adherents of the dynasts, the consular Gabinius, was overthrown in this way. Certainly in his case the implacable hatred of the aristocracy, which as little forgave him for the law regarding the conducting of the war with the pirates as for his disparaging treatment of the senate during his Syrian governorship, was combined with the rage of the great capitalists, against whom he had when governor of Syria ventured to defend the interests of the provincials, and even with the resentment of Crassus, with whom he had stood on ceremony in handing over to him the province. His only protection against all these foes was Pompeius, and the latter had every reason to defend his ablest, boldest, and most faithful adjutant at any price; but here, as everywhere, he knew not how to use his power and to defend his clients, as Caesar defended his; in the end of  $\frac{700}{64}$ the jurymen found Gabinius guilty of extortions and sent him into banishment.

On the whole, therefore, in the sphere of the popular elections and of the jury-courts it was the regents that fared worst. The elements which ruled in these were less tangible, and therefore more difficult to be terrified or corrupted than the direct organs of government and administration. The holders of power encountered here, especially in the popular elections, the tough energy of a close oligarchy—grouped in coteries—which is by no means finally disposed of when its rule is overthrown, and which is the more difficult to vanquish the more covert its action. They encountered here too, especially in the jury-courts, the repugnance of the middle classes towards the new monarchical rule, which with all the perplexities springing out of it they were as little able to remove. They suffered in both quarters a series of defeats. The election-victories of the opposition had, it is true, merely the value of demonstrations, since the regents possessed and employed the means of practically annulling any magistrate whom they disliked; but the criminal trials in which the opposition carried condemnations deprived them, in a way keenly felt, of useful auxiliaries. As things stood, the regents could neither set aside nor adequately control the popular elections and the jury-courts, and the opposition, however much it felt itself straitened even here, maintained to a certain extent the field of battle.

It proved, however, yet a more difficult task to encounter the opposition in a field, to which they turned with the greater zeal the more they were precluded from direct political action. This was literature. Even the judicial opposition was at the same time a literary one, and indeed pre-eminently so, for the orations were regularly published and served as political para-phlets. The arrows of poetry hit their mark still more rapidly and sharply. The lively youth of the high aristocracy, and still more energetically perhaps the cultivated middle class in the Italian country towns, waged the war of pamphlets and epigrams with zeal and success. There lought side by side or this field the noble senator's son Gaius Licinius Calvus (4.3-Tos) who was as much feared in the character of an orator and pamphleteer as of a versatile poet, and the municipals of Cremona and Verona Marcus Furius Bibaculus (for-in) and Quintus Valerius Catullus (1,27-c. 1,00) whose elegant and purgert epigrams flew swiftly like arrows through Italy and were sure to hit their mark. An oppositional tone prevails throughout the literature of these years. It is full of indignant sarraum against the "great Caesar," "the unique general," against the affectionate father-in-law and son-in-law, who ruin the whole globe in order to give their dissolute favourites opportunity to parade the spoils of the long-haired Celts through the streets - tel munt banquets with the booty of the farthers this period something or um. .

** * · r-mnlant henest

-1

hatred, of that republican agony overflowing in notices and or in stem despair, which are more prominently and powrifely apparent in Aristophanes and Demosthenes.

The most sagacious of the three rulers at least saw well that it was as impossible to despise this opposition as to suppress it by word of command. So far as he could, Gersar trade table personally to gain over the more eminent authors. Gero himself had to thank his literary reputation in god part Let the respectful treatment which he especially experienced from

The collection handes down to m is fall of references to the secretarity of the part of $200 and $200 and $200 and sex doubless put lined in the latter year, the material recent event which it monitous is the proceeding of Valuers (for all fall). The statemented Hierocommus that Catallant Leading $200 and $2

Caesar: but the governor of Gaul did not disdain to conclude a special peace even with Catullus through the intervention of his father who had become personally known to him in Verona; and the young poet, who had just heaped upon the powerful general the bitterest and most personal sarcasms, was treated by him with the most flattering distinction. In fact Caesar had genius enough to follow his literary opponents on their own domain and to publish—as an indirect defence against manifold attacks—a detailed report on the Gallic wars, which set forth before the public, with happily assumed naïveté, the necessity and constitutional propriety of his military operations. But it is freedom alone that is absolutely and exclusively poetical and creative; it and it alone is able even in its most wretched caricature, even with its latest breath, to inspire fresh enthusiasm. All the sound elements of literature were and remained anti-monarchical; and, if Caesar himself could venture on this domain without proving a failure, the reason was merely that even now he still cherished at heart the magnificent dream of a free commonwealth, although he was unable to transfer it either to his adversaries or to his adherents. Practical politics were not more absolutely controlled by the regents than literature by the republicans.1

<sup>1</sup> The well-known poem of Catullus numbered xxix, was written in  $\frac{699}{65}$ or  $\frac{700}{54}$  after Caesar's Britannic expedition and before the death of Julia:

Quis hoc potest videre, quis potest pati, Nisi impudicus et vorax et aleo, Mamurram habere quod comata Gallia Habebat ante et ultima Britannia? etc.

Mamurra of Formiae, Caesar's favourite and for a time during the Gallic wars an officer in his army, had, probably a short time before the composition of this poem, returned to the capital and was in all likelihood then occupied with the building of his much-talked-of marble palace furnished with lavish magnificence on the Caelian hill. The Pontic booty mentioned in the poem is that of Mytilene, of which Caesar had a share as one of the officers serving in  $\frac{675}{79}$  in the army of the governor of Bithynia and Pontus (iii. 325); the Iberian spoil is that which was acquired in the governorship of Further Spain (p. 184).

More innocent than this virulent invective, which was bitterly felt by

Caesar (Suet. Caes. 73), is another nearly contemporary poem of the same author (xi.) to which we may here refer, because with its pathetic introduction to an anything but pathetic commission it very cleverly quizzes the staff of the new regents—the Gabiniuses, Antoniuses, and such like, suddenly advanced from the lowest haunts to head-quarters. Let it be remembered that it was written at a time when Caesar was fighting on the Rhine and on the Thames, and when the expeditions of Crassus to Parthia and of Gabinius to Egypt were in preparation. The poet, as if he too expected one of the vacant posts from one of the regents, gives to two of his clients their last instructions before departure:

Furi et Aureli, comites Catulli, etc.

ing on fire. Thereafter the multitude proceeded to the front of Milo's house and kept it under siege, till his band drove of the assailants by a discharge of arrows They passed on to the house of Pompeius and of his consulur candidates, of whom the former was saluted as dictator and the latter as convols. and thence to the house of the interrex Marcus Lepidus, on whom devolved the conduct of the consular elections When the latter. as in duty bound, refused to make arrangements for the elections cm ltitude demanded, he was kept dwelling house But the insugators . scandalous scenes had overacted their part Certainly their lord and master was resolved to employ this favourable episode in order not merely to set aside Milo, but also to seize the dictatorship, he wished, however, to receive it not from a mob of b'udgeon men, but from the senate. Pompetus brought up troops to put down the anarchy which prevailed in the capital, and which had in real to become intolerable to everybods, at the same time he now enjoined what he had hitherto requested, and the senate complied It was merely an empty subterfuge, that on the proposal of Cato and Bibulus the proconsul Pompeius, retaining his former offices, was nominated as "consul miliout releasure instead of dictator (on the 25th of the intercalary month 1 174) -a subterfuge, which admitted an appellation labouring unifor a double incongnuity? for the mere purpose of avoiding one which expressed the simple fact, and which vividly terriads us of the sagacious resolution of the waning patricia's to conceed to the plebeians not the consulship, but only the consular power (1 247)

Thus in legal possession of full power, Pompetus ere to we's and proceeded with energy against the republican party which was powerful in the clubs and pury-courts. The exit of emace. ments as to elections were repeated and enforced in a spread law, and by another against electioneering intra es what obtained retrospective force for all offerers of this et ecemitted since "1", the penalties hitherto impored sere a mentel. Still more important was the exactment, if at the given in ga. which were by far the more important and especialy by far the the more lucrative half of official life, should be contined on the consuls and practors not immediately on thes returned free

In this year the Ja uary with an and the February with a date we a med by the first large meeth with as a differed by a consideration of earth and a committee wat the earth

time processal is at come an actuale me amf a e melle enter fate

the consulate or practorship, but only after the expiry of other five years; an arrangement which of course could only come into effect after four years, and therefore made the filling up of the governorships for the next few years substantially dependent on decrees of senate which were to be issued for the regulation of this interval, and thus practically on the person or section ruling the senate at the moment. The jury-commissions were left in existence, but limits were put to the right of counter-plea, and-what was perhaps still more important-the liberty of speech in the courts was done away; for both the number of the advocates and the time of speaking apportioned to each were restricted by fixing a maximum, and the bad habit which had prevailed of adducing, in addition to the witnesses as to facts, witnesses to character or laudatores, as they were called, in favour of the accused was prohibited. The obsequious senate further decreed on the suggestion of Pompeius that the country had been placed in peril by the quarrel on the Appian Way: accordingly a special commission was appointed by an exceptional law for all crimes connected with it, the members of which were directly nominated by Pompeius. An attempt was also made to give once more a serious importance to the office of the censors, and by that agency to purge the deeply disordered burgess-body of its worst elements.

All these measures were adopted under the pressure of the sword. In consequence of the declaration of the senate that the country was in danger, Pompeius called the men capable of service throughout Italy to arms and made them swear allegiance for all contingencies; an adequate and trustworthy corps was temporarily stationed at the Capitol; at every stirring of opposition Pompeius threatened armed intervention, and during the proceedings at the trial respecting the murder of Clodius stationed, contrary to all precedent, a guard over the place of trial itself.

The scheme for the revival of the censorship failed, because among the servile majority of the senate no one possessed sufficient moral courage and authority even to become a candidate for such an office. On the other hand Milo was condemned by the jurymen (8th April,  $\frac{7}{6}\frac{9}{2}$ ) and Cato's candidature for the consulship of  $\frac{7}{6}\frac{9}{1}$  was frustrated. The opposition of speeches and pamphlets received through the new judicial ordinances a blow from which it never recovered; the dreaded forensic eloquence was thereby driven from the field of politics, and thenceforth felt the restraints of monarchy. Opposition of course had not

ing on fire. Thereafter the multitude proceeded to the front of Milo's house and kept it under siege, till his band drove of the assailants by a discharge of arrows. They passed on to the house of Pompeius and of his consular candidates, of whom the former was saluted as dictator and the latter as comult, and thence to the house of the intervex Marcus Lepidus, on whom devolved the conduct of the consular elections. When the latter, as in duty bound, refused to make arrangements for the election immediately, as the clamorous multitude demanded, he was kept during five days under sierce in his dwelling bouse.

But the instigators of these scandalous scenes had overacted their part. Certainly their lord and master was resolved to employ this favourable episode in order not merely to set aside Milo, but also to seize the dictatorship; he wished, however, to receive it not from a mob of bludgeon-men, but from the senate. Pompeius brought up troops to put down the anarchy which prevailed in the capital, and which had in reality become intolerable to everybody; at the same time he now enjoined what he had hitherto requested, and the senate compiled. It was merely an empty subterfuge, that on the proposal of Cato and Bibulus the proconsul Pompeius, retaining his former offices, was nominated as "conrul without collecture"

"""" and dictator (on the 25th of the intercalary month." [15]

ding one which ninds us of the constitution to the constitution to sagacious resolution of the consulship, but only the consular power (1.5%)

Thus in legal possession of full power, I omptial set to welk and proceeded with energy against the republican party which was powerful in the clubs and jury-courts. The extrict environments as to elections were repeated and enforced by a special law; and by another against electionering interacts, which obtained retrospective force for all offences of the soft committed since $\frac{1}{2}\text{s}$, the penalties hitherto imposed were accounted since $\frac{1}{2}\text{s}$, the penalties hitherto imposed were accounted, which were by far the more important and especially by less the more lucrative half of official life, should be conferred on the consuls and practors not immediately on their returnent from

In this year the Jacousy with sy and the Fetcher with a phase wed followed by the interesting mouth with $2, and then $2.50 mile. "Consol signifies" in elegance" (it, says, and a come of the act the author time processed in at coop was actual event and a consolir suctate at a

the consulate or praetorship, but only after the expiry of other five years; an arrangement which of course could only come into effect after four years, and therefore made the filling up of the governorships for the next few years substantially dependent on decrees of senate which were to be issued for the regulation of this interval, and thus practically on the person or section ruling the senate at the moment. The jury-commissions were left in existence, but limits were put to the right of counter-plea, and-what was perhaps still more important-the liberty of speech in the courts was done away; for both the number of the advocates and the time of speaking apportioned to each were restricted by fixing a maximum, and the bad habit which had prevailed of adducing, in addition to the witnesses as to facts, witnesses to character or laudatores, as they were called, in favour of the accused was prohibited. The obsequious senate further decreed on the suggestion of Pompeius that the country had been placed in peril by the quarrel on the Appian Way; accordingly a special commission was appointed by an exceptional law for all crimes connected with it, the members of which were directly nominated by Pompeius. An attempt was also made to give once more a serious importance to the office of the censors, and by that agency to purge the deeply disordered burgess-body of its worst elements.

All these measures were adopted under the pressure of the sword. In consequence of the declaration of the senate that the country was in danger, Pompeius called the men capable of service throughout Italy to arms and made them swear allegiance for all contingencies; an adequate and trustworthy corps was temporarily stationed at the Capitol; at every stirring of opposition Pompeius threatened armed intervention, and during the proceedings at the trial respecting the murder of Clodius stationed, contrary to all precedent, a guard over the place of trial itself.

The scheme for the revival of the censorship failed, because among the servile majority of the senate no one possessed sufficient moral courage and authority even to become a candidate for such an office. On the other hand Milo was condemned by the jurymen (8th April,  $\frac{7}{5}0^{2}$ ) and Cato's candidature for the consulship of  $\frac{7}{5}0^{2}$  was frustrated. The opposition of speeches and pamphlets received through the new judicial ordinances a blow from which it never recovered; the dreaded forensic eloquence was thereby driven from the field of politics, and thenceforth felt the restraints of monarchy. Opposition of course had not tedious and very lucrative subordinate transactions. The temples of Derecto at Hierapolis Bamby ce and of Jehovah at Jenusalem and other rich shimes of the Synan province, were by order of Crassus despoiled of their treasures; and certangents or, still better, sums of money instead were levied freu all the subjects. The military operations of the first summer were limited to an extensive recommissance in Mesopotamia;

to Syria. They had huberto more advisable to march to Parthia by the circuitous route of Armenia or by the direct route through the Mesopotamian desert. The first route, leading through mountainous regions under the control of trustworthy allies, commended itself by its greater safety; king Artavasiles came in person to the Roman head-quarters to advocate this plan of campaign. But that reconnaissance decided in fasceof the march through Mesopotamia, The numerous ar ! flourishing Greek and half-Greek towns in the regions along the " 1. to and Tree of a not the great city of Seleucia, were "I the Greek townst ire .... . ... e . net had now, lke the citizens of Carriac at an earlier time (p. 127), practically shown how ready they were to shake off the intolerable foreign year and to receive the Romans as deliverers, almost as country men The Arab prince Abgarus, who commanded the desert of I devia and Carriae and thereby the usual route from the I uphra'es to the Tigns, had arrived in the camp of the Remant ! achieve them in person of his devotedness. The Parthum fail appeared to be wholly unprepared

Accordingly (%) the Fuphrates was crossed (over R may 1). To reach the Tigns from this point they had the close of two routes; either the army might more decreased shore the Euphrates to the latitude of Schwin where the Fuphrates and Tigns are only a few miles distant from each other; se they might immediately after crossing take the shortest two Latitudes of Schwin and Greet the Latitudes of Tigns right across the great Mesopotamian direct. The I river route led directly to the Parties of partial Chapters, which has opposite Schwin on the other hank of the Tigns, treesal we play voices were raised in favour of this rock on it is Normal council of war; in particular the quarrie Gaus Casma persons.

to the difficulties of the march in the desert, and to the suspicious reports arriving from the Roman garrisons on the left bank of the Euphrates as to the Parthian warlike preparations. But in opposition to this the Arab prince Abgarus announced that the Parthians were employed in evacuating their western provinces. They had already packed up their treasures and put themselves in motion to flee to the Hyrcanians and Scythians; only through a forced march by the shortest route was it at all possible still to reach them; but by such a march the Romans would probably succeed in overtaking and cutting up at least the rear guard of the great army under Sillaces and the vizier, and obtaining enormous spoil. These reports of the friendly Bedouins decided the direction of the march; the Roman army, consisting of seven legions, 4000 cavalry, and 4000 slingers and archers, turned off from the Euphrates and away into the inhospitable plains of northern Mesopotamia.

Far and wide no enemy appeared; only hunger and thirst, and the endless sandy desert, seemed to keep watch at the gates of the East. At length, after many days of toilsome marching, not far from the first river which the Roman army had to cross, the Balissus (Belik), the first horsemen of the enemy were descried. Abgarus with his Arabs was sent out to reconnoitre; the Parthian squadrons retired up to and over the river and vanished in the distance, pursued by Abgarus and his followers. With impatience the Romans waited for his return and for more exact information. The general hoped here at length to come upon the constantly retreating foe; his young and brave son Publius, who had fought with the greatest distinction in Gaul under Caesar (pp. 223, 235), and had been sent by the latter at the head of a Celtic squadron of horse to take part in the Parthian war, was inflamed with a vehement desire for the fight. no tidings came, they resolved to advance at a venture: the signal for starting was given, the Balissus was crossed, the army after a brief insufficient rest at noon was led on without delay at a rapid pace. Then suddenly the kettledrums of the Parthians sounded all around; on every side their silken gold-embroidered banners were seen waving, and their iron helmets and coats of mail glittering in the blaze of the hot noonday sun; and by the side of the vizier stood prince Abgarus with his Bedouins.

The Romans saw too late the net in which they had allowed themselves to be ensured. With sure glance the vizier had thoroughly seen both the danger and the means of meeting it. Nothing could be accomplished against Roman infantry of the line with Oriental infantry. to he had got nd of this arm and by sending a mass which was useless in the man feld of lattly under the personal leadership of king Orodes to Armenia he had prevented king Artavasdes from allowing the promind 10 000 heavy cavalry to join the army of Crassus who per namfully felt the want of them On the other hard the virge met the Roman tactics, unsurpassed of their kind, with a system entirely different. His army consisted exclusively of cavalry, the line was formed of the heavy horsemen arried with I-z thrusting lances, and protected, man and horse, by a coat of mail of metallic plates or a feathern doublet and by s ruler greaves; the mass of the troops consisted of mounted arther As compared with these, the Romans were thoroughly inferior in the corresponding arms both as to number and excelence Their infantify of the line, excellent as they were in close combat whether at A short distance with the heavy javelin or in fant to-hand combat with the sword, could not compel an amy consisting I wholly of cavalry to come to an engagement made them, and they found, even when they did come to a hand toconflict t, an equal if not superior adversary in the irrection of landners As compared with an army like the Par 12 Reficman army was at a disadvantage strategial's, the cares valry commanded the communications, and are the cell's rain; commanded the communications, and as a antage of actically, because every weapon of of the curies actically, because every weapon of of the curies actically, because every weapon of of the consentration that which is wielded from a distance under stringele be's comment of the concentrated; thousand, or which the whole Reman restold war was based of increased the diager in practice of such a statack, the cloud better the rainks of the Roman column, the some intessibile certain all, was its ones, but the less also exact the missiles fail to him of their mark. Under ordinary crummares where towns have the best described and difficulties of the president of the considerable and action of the considerable and protaminal desert, where the same about like a ship or the bitting, seas neither encountered as characteristics. like a ship on the higher the rategie dispositions dam's mire dire the a stip or the high. It sees notices even the entire direct with a has a for a few event and dispositions damage and even march, this mode of warfapat he as it to be dead pot them as "it that circumstances allowed arth at to be dead pot them as "it must and therefore all he last years. There event again within and therefore all he last years a dawless was a restricted to put the for you refer to the country. Where the flatter within latter was the country. Where the flatter within latter Remains was the flatter of the flatter of the standard the region of the standard through the country of the standard through the sandard the standard through the sandard the suppose at suppose the standard through the sandard the suppose the suppose the sandard through the sandard the suppose the suppose the sandard through the sandard the suppose the sandard through the sandard the sandard through the sandard through the sandard through the san rapped harse'l to bomely through perished from hunger or still more from thirst amid the pathless route marked only by water-springs that were far apart and difficult to find, the Parthian horseman, accustomed from child-hood to sit on his fleet steed or camel, nay almost to spend his life in the saddle, easily traversed the desert whose hardships he had long learned how to lighten or in case of need to bear. There no rain fell to mitigate the intolerable heat, and to slacken the bow-strings and leathern thongs of the enemy's archers and slingers; there amidst the deep sand at many places ordinary ditches and ramparts could hardly be formed for the camp. Imagination can scarcely conceive a situation in which all the military advantages were more on the one side, and all the disadvantages more thoroughly on the other.

To the question, under what circumstances this new style of tactics, the first national system that on its own proper ground showed itself superior to the Roman, arose among the Parthians, we can only reply by conjectures. The lancers and mounted archers were of great antiquity in the East, and already formed the flower of the armies of Cyrus and Darius; but hitherto these arms had been employed only as secondary, and essentially to cover the thoroughly useless Oriental infantry. The Parthian armies also by no means differed in this respect from the other Oriental ones; armies are mentioned, five-sixths of which consisted of infantry. In the campaign of Crassus, on the other hand, the cavalry for the first time came forward independently, and this arm obtained quite a new application and quite a different value. The irresistible superiority of the Roman infantry in close combat seems to have led the adversaries of Rome in very different parts of the world independently of each other-at the same time and with similar success-to meet it with cavalry and distant weapons. What was completely successful with Cassivellaunus in Britain (p. 242) and partially successful with Vercingetorix in Gaul (p. 252)—what was to a certain degree attempted even by Mithradates Eupator (p. 64) -the vizier of Orodes carried out only on a larger scale and more completely: And in doing so he had special advantages: for he found in the heavy cavalry the means of forming a line; the bow which was national in the East and was handled with masterly skill in the Persian provinces gave him an effective weapon for distant combat; and lastly the peculiarities of the country and the people enabled him freely to realise his brilliant idea. Here, where the Roman weapons of close combat and the Roman system of concentration yielded for the first time before the weapons of more distant warfare and the system of deploying, was initiated that military revolution which only reached its completion with the introduction of fire-arms.

Under such circumstances the first battle between the Romans and Parthians was fought amidst the sandy desert thirty miles to the south of Carrhae (Harran) where there was a Roman garrison, and at a somewhat less distance to the north of Ithrae. The Roman archers were sent forward, but retired immediately before the enormous numerical superiority and the far greater clasticity and range of the Parthian bows. The legions, which, in spite of the advice of the more signatious officers that they should be deployed as much as possible against the enemy, had been drawn up in a dense square of twelve cohorts on each's de, were soon outflanked and overwhelmed with the formidable arrows, which under such circumstances hit their man even without special aim, and against which the soldiers had to means of retaliation. The hope that the enemy might expend his missiles vanished with a glance at the endless marge of camels laden with arrows. The Parthians were still extended their line. That the outflanking might not end in sutrounders. Publius Crassus advanced to the attack with a select corps of envalry, archers, and infantry of the line. The enemy in fart abandoned the attempt to close the circle, and retreated, both by the impetuous leader of the Romans. But, when

" corps of Publics had totally fost sight of the main army, the heavy cavalry made a stand against it, and the l'arthun lost hastening up from all sides closed in like a net mundit. PuN =: who saw his troops falling thickly and vainly around him andr the armys of the mounted archers, threw hunself in desperation with his Celtic cavalry unprotected by any coats of rail on the iron-clad lancers of the enemy; but the fearless valour of his Celts, who seized the lances with their hands or spears from their horses to stab the enemy, performed its many's in warn The remains of the corps, including their leader wounded in the sword arm, were driven to a slight eminence, where they only served for an easier mark to the enemy's archers, Meaopentumian Greeks, who were accurately acquainted with the country, adjuted Crassus to ride off with then and make an attempt to escape; but he refused to separate his la'e from that of the brave men whom his too daring courage had bed to des't. and he caused himself to be stateed by the hard of his phase. bearer. Following his example, east of the orly surviving off cers put themselves to death. Of the whole day 1 on, about the Roman camp to offer, in the name of his king, peace and friendship to the Romans, and to propose a personal conference between the two generals. The Roman army, demoralised as it was, adjured and indeed compelled its leader to accept the offer. The vizier received the consular and his staff with the usual honours, and offered anew to conclude a compact of friendship; only, with just butterness recalling the fate of the agreements concluded with Lucullus and Pompeius respecting the Euphrates boundary (p. 131), he demanded that it should be immediately reduced to writing. A richly adorned horse was produced; it was a present from the king to the Roman commander-in-chief; the servants of the vizier crowded round Crassus, zealous to mount him on the steed. It seemed to the Roman officers as if there was a design to seize the person of the commander-in-chief: Octavius, unarmed as he was, rulled the sword of one of the Parthians from its sheath and stabled the groom. In the tumult which thereupon arose, the Roman officers were all put to death; the grey-haired commander-trchief also, like his grand-uncle (m. 52), was unwill ng to serve at a' terte et en fi enemy, ne fen eht and found death. De in the facility of the expension of the leaver were partir then the long train of spends. What i've die of Cambri had begun, the day of Sinnaca completed (June 9, 1,1); the two took their place side by side with the days of the Alia, of Connae, and of Arausio. The army of the Euphrates was no more. Only the squadron of Gains Cassius, which had been broken off from the main army on the retreat from Carrist. and some other scattered bands and isolated fugitives surrented in escaping from the Parthians and Bedouirs and separately finding their way back to Syria. Of above 49,000 Reman Sports Filters · their safter

Parthian fashion to render initiary service. For the first time, since the eagles had headed the legions, they had between it the same year trophies of victory in the hards of trench rate of almost contemporantously of a German inle in the West(p. 12) and of the Parthians in the East. As to the wigners in which defeat of the Remans produced in the Fast, and stronger on the no adequate information has reached us; but it must have been and lasting. King Orosfes was particular changes to produce the same particular time.

king of Armenia, when the announcement of the victory of his vizier arrived, and along with it, according to Oriental usage, the cut-off head of Crassus. The tables were already removed; one of the wandering companies of actors from Asia Minor, numbers of which at that time existed and carried Hellenic poetry and the Hellenic drama far into the East, was just performing before the assembled court the Bacchae of Euripides. The actor playing the part of Agave, who in her Dionysiac frenzy has torn in pieces her son and returns from Cithaeron carrying his head on the thyrsus, exchanged this for the bloody head of Crassus, and to the infinite delight of his audience of half-Hellenised barbarians began afresh the well-known song:

φέρομεν εξ δρεος Ελικα νεότομον επί μέλαθρα μακαρίαν θήραν.

It was, since the times of the Achaemenidae, the first serious victory which the Orientals had achieved over the West; and there was a deep significance in the fact that, by way of celebrating his victory, the fairest product of the western world—Greek tragedy—parodied itself through its degenerate representatives in that hideous burlesque. The civic spirit of Rome and the genius of Hellas began simultaneously to accommodate themselves to the chains of sultanism.

The disaster, terrible in itself, seemed also as though it was to be dreadful in its consequences, and to shake the foundations of the Roman power in the East. It was among the least of its results that the Parthians now had absolute sway beyond the Euphrates; that Armenia, after having fallen away from the Roman alliance even before the disaster of Crassus, was reduced by it into entire dependence on Parthia; that the faithful, citizens of Carrhae were bitterly punished for their adherence to the Occidentals by the new master appointed over them by the Parthians, one of the treacherous guides of the Romans, named Andromachus. The Parthians now prepared in earnest to cross the Euphrates in their turn, and, in union with the Armenians and Arabs, to dislodge the Romans from Syria. The Jews and various other Occidentals awaited emancipation from the Roman rule there, no less impatiently than the Hellenes beyond the Euphrates awaited relief from the Parthian; in Rome civil war was at the door; an attack at this particular. place and time was a grave peril. But fortunately for Rome the leaders on each side had changed. Sultan Orodes was too much indebted to the heroic prince, who had first placed the crown on his head and then cleared the land from the energy, not to get rid of him as soon as possible by the executions. His place as commander in-chief of the invading army destined for Syria was filled by a prince, the lang's son Pacorus, with whom on account of his youth and inexpenence the prince Osaces had to be associated as military adviser. On the other side the interim command in Syria in room of Crasius was taken up by the prudent and resolute quiestor Gauss Cassii.

The Parthans were, just like Crassus formerly, in no have to attack, but during the years and the sent only wrak flying bands, who were easily repulsed, across the Fuphra'es, so that Cassius obtained time to reorganise the army in some measure, and with the help of the faithful adherent of the Romans, Herodes Antipater, to reduce to obedience the Jews, whom their resentment at the spoliation of the temple perpetrated by Crassus had already driven to arms. The Reman government had thus full time to send fresh troops for the defence of the threatened frontier, but this was left unified amidst the convulsions of the incipient serolution and, when at length in "" the great Parthum invading arms appeared on the Euphrates, Cassius had still nothing to oppose to it but the two weak legions formed from the remains of the army of Cravius Of course with these he could neither present the er ne ng n g defend the province. Syria was overrun by the Parth and and all Western Asia trembled. But the Parthians did not under stand the besieging of towns. They not only retreated from Antioch, into which Cassius had thrown himself with 1 a tree or without having accomplished their object, but they were it their re reat along the Orontes allured into an amin in the Cassias' cavalry and there severely handled by the final infantry, prince Osaces was himself among the slan Bear and for thus perceived that the Parthian army in fer an ter and general and on ordinary ground was not capalite of po the re than any other Oriental array However, the at the war to abandoned I acorus la encamped during the water of tag In Cyrhestica on the sude of the Euphra 1 and the new governor of Syria, Vareus Il bulus, as wretered a general as to was an incapable statesman, knew no tester curse if a last than to shut hemself up in his fortresses. It was generally especied that the war would leest out in 110 with remeath fore. But instead of turning his arms again to a recess Pac his turned against his own father, and amen high even entered into an understanding with the Roman governor, Thus the stain was not wiped from the shield of Roman honour, nor was the reputation of Rome restored in the East; but the Parthian invasion of Western Asia was over, and the Euphrates boundary was, for the time being at least, retained.

In Rome meanwhile the periodical volcano of revolution was whirling upward its clouds of stupefying smoke. The Romans began to have no longer a soldier or a denarius to be employed against the public foe-no longer a thought for the destinies of the nations. It is one of the most dreadful signs of the times, that the huge national disaster of Carrhae and Sinnaca gave the politicians of that time far less to think and speak of than that wretched tumult on the Appian road, in which, a couple of months after Crassus, Clodius the partisan-leader perished; but it is easily conceivable and almost excusable. The breach between the two regents, long felt as inevitable and often announced 'as near, was now assuming such a shape that it could not be stopped. Like the boat of the ancient Greek mariners' tale, the vessel of the Roman community now found itself as it were between two rocks swimming towards each other; expecting every moment the crash of collision, those whom it was bearing tortured by nameless anguish into the eddying surge that rose higher and higher, were benumbed; and, while every slightest movement there attracted a thousand eyes, no one ventured to give a glance to the right or the left.

After Caesar had, at the conference of Luca in April 608 agreed to considerable concessions as regarded Pompeius, and the regents had thus placed themselves substantially on a level, their relation was not without the outward conditions of durability, so far as a division of the monarchical power-in itself indivisible—could be lasting at all. It was a different question whether the regents, at least for the present, were determined to keep together and mutually to acknowledge without reserve their title to rank as equals. That this was the case with Caesar, in so far as he had acquired the interval necessary for the conquest of Gaul at the price of equalisation with Pompeius, has been already set forth. But Pompeius was hardly ever, even provisionally, in earnest with the collegiate scheme. His was one of those petty and mean natures, towards which it is dangerous to practise magnanimity; to his paltry spirit it appeared certainly a dictate of prudence to supplant at the first opportunity his reluctantly acknowledged rival, and his mean soul thirsted after a possibility of retaliating on Caesar for the humiliation which he had suffered through Caesar's indulgence. But while it is probable that Pompeius in accordance with his heavy and sluggish nature never properly consented to let Caesar bold a position of equality by his side, yet the design of breaking up the alliance doubtless came only by degrees to be distinctly entertained by him. At any rate the public, which usually saw better through the views and intention of Pompeius than he did himself, could not be mistaken in thinking that at least with the death of the beautiful Juliawho died in the bloom of womanhood in the autumn of "" and was soon followed by her only child to the temb-the personal relation between her father and her husband was broke up. Caesar attempted to re-establish the ties of affinity whi fate had severed; he asked for himself the hand of the on daughter of Pompeius, and offered Octavia, his sister's grant daughter, who was now his nearest relative, in marriage to h fellow-regent; but Pompeius left his daughter to her existir husband Faustus Sulla the son of the regent, and he himse married the daughter of Quintus Metellus Scipio. The person breach had unmistakably begun, and it was Pomprins wh drew back his hand. It was expected that a political break would at once follow; but in this people were mistaken; it public affairs a collegiate understanding continued for a time to subsist. The reason was, that Caesar did not with public, to dissolve the relation before the subjugation of Gaul wa a accomplished, and Pompeius did not with to dissolve it below the governing authorities and Italy should be whelly reduced under his power by his investiture with the dictatorship. It is singular, but yet readily admits of explanation, that the tra-ti under these circumstances supported each other; Pergeici after the disaster of Aduatuca in the winter of the harded ever one of his Italian legions that were dismissed on lather the way of loan to Caesar; on the other hand Caesar granted his consent and his moral support to Pempeius in the experience measures which the latter took against the stubblem expublican opposition.

It was only after Pompeius had in this way procured for himself at the beginning of \$\frac{1}{2}\psi\$ the undowfed consulting and an influence in the capital thoroughly convey drug that of Caccar, and after all the men capable of arms at Itale had tendered their military oath to himself perseally and as he name, that he frimed the travelution to break as seen as pour la formally with Caccar; and the design because darmetly enough apparent. That the judicial prosecution which took place after the tumult on the Appian Way lighted with unsparing severity precisely on the old democratic partisans of Caesar (p. 306), might perhaps pass as a mere awkwardness. That the new law against electioneering intrigues, which had retrospective effect as far as and, included also the dubious proceedings at Caesar's candidature for the consulship (p. 304), might likewise be nothing more, although not a few Caesarians thought that they perceived in it a definite design. But people could no longer shut their eyes, however willing they might be to do so, when Pompeius did not select for his colleague in the consulship his former father-in-law Caesar, as was fitting in the circumstances of the case and was in many quarters demanded, but associated with himself a puppet wholly dependent on him in his new father-in-law Scipio (p. 307); and still less, when Pompeius at the same time got the governorship of the two Spains continued to him for five years more, that is to  $\frac{700}{25}$ , and a considerable fixed sum appropriated from the state-chest for the payment of his troops, not only without stipulating for a like prolongation of command and a like grant of money to Caesar, but even while labouring ulteriorly to effect the recall of Caesar before the term formerly agreed on through the new regulations which were issued at the same time regarding the holding of the governor-ships. These encroachments were unmistakably calculated to undermine Caesar's position and eventually to overthrow him. The moment could not be more favourable. Caesar had conceded so much to Pompeius at Luca, only because Crassus and his Syrian army would necessarily, in the event of any rupture with Pompeius, be thrown into Caesar's scale; for upon Crassus -who since the times of Sulla had been at the deepest enmity with Pompeius and almost as long politically and personally allied with Caesar, and who from his peculiar character at all events, if he could not himself be king of Rome, would have been content to be the new king's banker-Caesar could always reckon, and could have no apprehension at all of seeing Crassus enter into an alliance with his enemies. The catastrophe of June  $\frac{701}{63}$ , by which army and general in Syria perished, was therefore a terribly severe blow for Caesar. A few months later the national insurrection burst forth more violently than ever in Gaul, just when it had seemed completely subdued, and for the first time Caesar there encountered an equal opponent in the Arvernian king Vercingetorix. Once more fate had been working for Pompeius; Crassus was dead, all Gaul was in revolt, Pompeius was practically dictator of Rome and master of the senate. What might have happened, if he had now, instead of remotely intriguing against Caesar, summarily compelled the burgesses or the senate to recall Caesar at once from Gaulf B.: Pompeius never understood how to take advantage of fortunder he heralded the breach clearly enough; already in 25th he acts left no doubt about it, and in the spring of 25th he present a first purpose of breaking with Caesar; but he d in not break with hum, and allowed the months to slip awa unemployed.

But however Pompeius might delay, the crisis was incessantiurged on by the mere force of circumstances. The impend ing war was not eventually a struggle between republic as monarchy-for that had been virtually decided years telerebut a struggle between Pompeius and Carsar for the pomention of the grown of Rome. But neither of the pretenders found to account in uttering the plain truth; he would have thereby driven all that very respectable portion of the briggenes, why h desired the continuance of the republic and believed in its possibility, directly into the camp of his opponent. The eld battle-cries raised by Gracehus and Drusus, Cines and Sulla, used up and meaningless as they were, remained still grow enough for watchwords in the struggle of the two greens contending for sole power; and, though for the marrent tor! · Pompelus and Caesar ranked themselves officially with the ke called popular party, it could not be for a moment d'ul falt's Caesar would inscribe on his banner the people and demander eratic progress, Pompeius the aristocracy and the being and constitution.

Caesar had no choice. He was from the order and are carnestly a democrat; the morarrhy as he understood of desermore in name than in reality from the Gracelan generation of the people; and he was too magnitudes and too profess of a statesmen to conceal his colours and to fight under are charged to the control than his own. The immediate advantage or charge, which this lattle-cry brought to him, was it had, it was too fixed mainly to the circumstance that he was it from the inconvenience of directly naming the headers of the salarming the mains of the latterarm and it can after the the that detected word. The democratic handle had, with the rendered inflamous and inflamous the Chifact for when with their cooperations and another than the convenience of inflamous to Chifact for when we will there row—laying ande perhaps the free painters—and shad of any sort of importance, which would have been induced by the battle-cries of the democracy to take part in the stringgle?

This state of things would have decided the part of Pompeius in the impending struggle, even if apart from this it had not been self-evident that he could only enter into it as the general of the legitimate republic. Nature had destined him, if ever any one, to be a member of an aristocracy; and nothing but very accidental and very selfish motives had carried him over as a deserter from the aristocratic to the democratic camp. That he should now revert to his Sullan traditions was not merely natural, but in every respect of essential advantage. Effete as was the democratic cry, the conservative cry could not but have the more potent effect if it proceeded from the right man. Perhaps the majority, at any rate the flower of the burgesses, belonged to the constitutional party; and as respected its numerical and moral strength might well be called to interfere powerfully, perhaps decisively, in the impending struggle of the pretenders. It wanted nothing but a leader. Marcus Cato, its present head, did the duty, as he understood it, of its leader amidst daily peril of his life and perhaps without hope of success; his fidelity to duty deserves respect, but to be the last at a forlorn nost is commendable in the soldier, not in the general. He had not the skill either to organise or to bring into action at the proper rime the powerful reserve, which had sprung up as it were spontaneously in Italy for the party of the overthrown government; and he had for good reasons never made any pretension to the military leadership, on which everything ultimately depended. If instead of this man, who knew not how to act either as party chief or as general, a man of the political and military mark of Pompeius should raise the banner of the existing constitution, the municipals of Italy would necessarily flock towards it in crowds, that under it they might help to fight, if not indeed for the kingship of Pompeius, at any rate against the kingship of Caesar.

To this was added another consideration at least as important. It was characteristic of Pompeius, even when he had formed a resolve, not to be able to find his way to its execution. While he knew perhaps how to conduct war but certainly not how to declare it, the Catonian party, although assuredly unable to conduct it, was very able and above all very ready to furnish reasons for war against the monarchy which was in course of being established. According to the intention of Pompeius, while he kept himself aloof and in his peculiar way now talked as though he would immediately depart for his Spanish provinces now made preparations as though he would set out to take the command on the Euphrates, the legitimate governing beand namely the senate, were to break with Caesar, to declare was against him, and to entrust the conduct of it to Pompetus, who then, yielding to the general desire, was to come forward as the protector of the constitution against demagogree-monarchical plots, as an upright man and champion of the existing order of things against the profligates and anarchists, as the duly installed general of the senate against the Imperator of the street, and so once more to save his country. Thus Perspents gained by the alliance with the conservatives both a second army in ad 1 tim to his personal adherents, and a suitable war manifesto-advan tages which certainly were purchased at the high price of seed escing with those who were in principle opposed to him. Of the countless evils involved in this coalit on there was developed in the meantime only one-but that already a very grave erro that Pompeius surrendered the power of commencing best it en against Caesar when and how he pleased, and in this decision point made himself dependent on all the accelmits and capra es of an anstocratic corporation

Thus the republican opposition, after having been for years obliged to rest content with the part of a mere spectator and aving hardly ventured to whisper, was now brought look more to the political stage by the impending ruphic between the regents. It consisted primarily of the circl which rall ed round (ato-those republicans who were received to venture on the stringle for the republic and against the min archy under all circumstances, and the society the term. The pittful issue of the attempt raiders \( \frac{1}{2} \text{ (p. ni)} \) had to the either to conduct was no even to call it footh, \( \frac{1}{2} \text{ (p. ni)} \) had to the either to conduct was no even to call it footh, \( \frac{1}{2} \text{ (p. ni)} \) had to either to conduct was no even to call it footh, \( \frac{1}{2} \text{ (p. ni)} \) had to even one that even in the scrate, will be the whole corporate with a few is slated exceptions was assume to movement if it is right be restored evidence dargerous which case is the sure, it right have a proof while to war. In general even extends the regents on the one hand, and on the other hand of the sear of any many title, which do not present shows all the great as far away now and was average to any decoded action and most of all to according to the first here. In the law is a coshimor with the law dangerous of the nearth rule lay in a coshimor with the law dangerous of the nearth.

If Pompeius acknowledged the oligarchic constitution and offered to fight for it against Caesar, the republican opposition might and must recognise him as its general, and in alliance with him compel the timid majority to a declaration of war. That Pompeius was not quite in earnest with his fidelity to the constitution could indeed escape nobody; but, undecided as he was in everything, he had by no means arrived like Caesar at a clear and firm conviction that it must be the first business of the new monarch to sweep off thoroughly and conclusively the oligarchic lumber. At any rate the war would train a really republican army and really republican generals; and, after the victory over Caesar, they might proceed with more favourable prospects to set aside not merely one of the monarchs, but the monarchy itself, which was in the course of formation. perate as was the cause of the oligarchy, the offer of Pompeius to become its ally was the most favourable arrangement possible

The conclusion of the alliance between Pompeius and the Catonian party was effected with comparative rapidity. Already during the dictatorship of Pompeius a remarkable approximation had taken place between them. The whole behaviour of Pompeius in the Milonian crisis, his abrupt repulse of the mob that offered him the dictatorship, his distinct declaration that he would accept this office only from the senate, his unrelenting severity against disturbers of the peace of every sort and especially against the ultra-democrats, the surprising complaisance with which he treated Cato and those who shared his views, appeared as much calculated to gain the men of order as they were offensive to the democratic Caesar. On the other hand Cato and his followers, instead of combating with their wonted sternness the proposal to confer the dictatorship on Pompeius, had made it with immaterial alterations of form their own; Pompeius had received the undivided consulship immediately from the hands of Bibulus and Cato. While the Catonian party and Pompeius had thus at least a tacit understanding as early as the beginning of  $\frac{702}{62}$ , the alliance might be held as formally concluded, when at the consular elections for  $\frac{703}{51}$  there was elected not Cato himself indeed, but—along with an insignificant man belonging to the majority of the senateone of the most decided adherents of Cato, Marcus Claudius Marcellus. Marcellus was no furious zealot and still less a genius, but a steadfast and strict aristocrat, just the right man to declare war if war was to be begun with Caesar. As stood, this election, so surprising after the repress ve measures adopted immediately before against the repullican opposition can hardly have occurred otherwise than with the content, or at least under the tacit permission, of the regent of Rome ! ? the time being. Slowly and awkwardly as was his went, but surels and steadily Pompeius mosed onward to the rupture

It was not the intention of Caesar on the other hard to fall out at this moment with Pompeius. He could not indeed desar seriously and permanently to share the ruling power with any colleague, least of all with one of so secondary a cort as was Pinn penus, and beyond doubt he had long resolved after term nating the conquest of Gaul to take the sole power for himself, and in case of need to extort it by force of arms. But a man him Caesar, in whom the officer was thoroughly salvoring'e to the state man, could not fail to perceive that the regulation of the political organism by force of arms does in its consequer a deeply and often permanently disorganite it, and there or he could not but seek to solve the dimentir, if at a'l proud . by peaceful incans or at least without open civil war

even if civil war was not to be avoided, he could not doute to he driven to it at a time when in Gail the ning of Leman tonx imperilled afresh all that had been of tarned and occupied of 1511, and when l'ompens and the constitutional purity red to him on nunciols were domeant in Italy Armine

If this should not be successful, and if there should be, as was certainly possible, a necessity for ultimately resorting to the decision of arms, Caesar would then as consul in Rome dispose of the compliant majority of the senate; and he could impede or perhaps frustrate the coalition of the Pompeians and the republicans, and conduct the war far more suitably and more advantageously, than if he now as proconsul of Gaul gave orders to march against the senate and its general. the success of this plan depended on Pompeius being goodnatured enough to let Caesar still obtain the consulship for 706 promised to him at Luca; but, even if it failed, it would be always of advantage for Caesar to have given practical and repeated evidence of the most yielding disposition. On the one hand time would thus be gained for attaining his object meanwhile in Gaul; on the other hand his opponents would be left with the odium of initiating the rupture and consequently the civil war—which was of the utmost moment for Caesar with reference to the majority of the senate and the party of material interests, and more especially with reference to his own soldiers.

On these views he acted. He armed certainly; the number of his legions was raised through new levies in the winter of  $\frac{702-703}{62-51}$  to eleven, including that borrowed from Pompeius. But at the same time he expressly and openly approved of Pompeius' conduct during the dictatorship and the restoration of order in the capital which he had effected, rejected the warnings of officious friends as calumnies, reckoned every day by which he succeeded in postponing the catastrophe a gain, overlooked whatever could be overlooked and bore whatever could be borne-immovably adhering only to the one decisive demand that, when his governorship of Gaul came to an end with  $\frac{7.05}{3.5}$ , the second consulship, admissible by republican state-law and promised to him according to agreement by his colleague, should be granted to him for the year  $\frac{706}{48}$ .

This very demand became the battle-field of the diplomatic war which now began. If Caesar were compelled either to resign his office of governor before the last day of December  $\frac{705}{49}$ , or to postpone the assumption of the magistracy in the capital beyond the 1st January  $\frac{700}{48}$ , so that he should remain for a time between the governorship and the consulate without office, and consequently liable to criminal impeachment—which according to Roman law was only allowable against one who was not in office—the public had good reason to prophesy for him in this case the fate of Milo, because Cato had for long been ready to impeach him and Pompeius was a more than doubtful protector.

Now, to attain that object, Caesar's opponents fail a very simple means. According to the existing ordinare as its elections, every candidate for the considing was old ord to announce himself personally to the presiding magistrate, and to cause his name to be inscribed on the official list of candidates before the election, that is half a year before entering on effects. It had probably been regarded in the conferences at Lica as a matter of course that Caesar would be released from the obligation, which was purely formal and was very often dispectivity, but the decree to that effect had not yet been used, and, as Pompeus was now in possession of the decretive rushners, Caesar depended in this respect on the good will of his must. Pompeus incomprehensibly abandoned of his own around the caesar work possions; with his consent and during his dence of Carrat was dispersed

Lowever arm afterwards
hwas found, the of Lores of of candidates personan, as therestere was repeated in consequently terms, and no exception was reserted in favour of those released from it by earlier resolution of the people, accreting to strict form the privilege granted in favour of Cartar was cancelled by the fater general five. Cantar configural, and the clause was subsequently appended but not confirmed by special decree of the people, so that this enaction it iterated by next interpolation in the already promutgated law goods or to enter before 1st January  $\frac{706}{48}$ . So far Caesar had still during the last ten months of  $\frac{706}{49}$  a right to the command, not on the ground of the Pompeio-Licinian law, but on the ground of the old rule that a command with a set term still continued after the expiry of the term up to the arrival of the successor. But now, since the new regulation of  $\frac{702}{52}$  called to the governorships not the consuls and praetors going out, but those who had gone out five years ago, or more, and thus prescribed an interval between the civil magistracy and the command instead of the previous immediate sequence, there was no longer any difficulty in straightway filling up from another quarter every legally vacant governorship. The pitiful dissimulation and procrastinating artifice of Pompeius are after a remarkable manner mixed up, in these arrangements, with the wily formalism and the constitutional erudition of the republican party. Years before these weapons of state-law could be employed, they had them duly prepared, and put themselves in a condition on the one hand to compel Caesar to the resignation of his command from the day when the term secured to him by Pompeius' own law expired, that is from the 1st March  $\frac{705}{49}$ , by sending successors to him, and on the other hand to be able to treat as null and void the votes tendered for him at the elections for  $\frac{70 \, \text{f}}{48}$ . Caesar, not in a position to hinder these moves, kept silence and left things to their own course.

receptation in the arready product where Property, there is, might have simply kept by the law, be had preferred fait to make a spontaneous concession, than to recall it, and faith to partial the recall in a ranner root theret.

Gradually therefore the slow course of constitutional procedure developed itself. According to custom the senate had to deliberate on the governorships of the year  $\frac{70.5}{4.9}$ , so far as they went to former consuls, at the beginning of  $\frac{703}{51}$ , so far as they went to former practors, at the beginning of  $\frac{704}{50}$ ; that earlier deliberation gave the first occasion to discuss the nomination of new governors for the two Gauls in the senate, and thereby the first occasion for open collision between the constitutional party pushed forward by Pompeius and the senatorial supporters of Caesar. The consul Marcus Marcellus introduced a proposal to give the two provinces hitherto administered by the proconsul Gaius Caesar from the 1st March  $\frac{705}{49}$  to the two consulars who were to be provided with governorships for that year. The long-repressed indignation burst forth in a torrent through the sluice once opened; everything that the Catonians were meditating against Caesar was brought forward in these discussions. For them it was a settled point, that the right granted by exceptional law to the proconsul Caesar of announcing his candidature for the consulship in absence had been again can339 and History-of, Rome; it Book v.

ti
oj
of
of
find served out their time. The bestowal of lurgess rights and of had served out their time. The bestowal of burgess rights and establishment of colonies by Caesar in Upper Italy were described by them as a contraction of the Caesar.

the Caesar and Latin rights, was entitled to lay claim to Roman citizenship, should receive the punishment of scourging, which was admissible only in the case of non burgesses

The supporters of Caesar at this time-among whora Gaius Vibius Pansa, who was the son of a man proscribed by Sulla but yet had entered on a political career, formerly an officer in Caesar's army and in this year tribune of the people, was the most notable-affirmed in the senate that both the state of things in Gaul and equity demanded not only that Carrar should not be recalled before the time, but that he should be allowed to retain the command along with the consulship, and they pointed beyond doubt to the facts, that a few years previously Pompeius had just in the same way commined the bpanish governorships with the consulate, that even at the present time, besides the important office of superintending the supply of food to the capital, he held the supreme command in Italy in addition to the Spanish, and that in fact the whole men capable of arms had been sworn in by him and had not yet been released from their oath.

The process began to take shape, but its course was not on that account more rupid. The n aports of the senate, sering the breich approaching, allowed no sixting capable of susing a decree to take place for months, and other months in their turn were lost through the solemn procrestination of Forepeits. At length the latter broke the silence and ranged himely, not a reserved and vacillating fashion as usual but yet planly knowledge, on the side of the constitutional party against his former ally. He summanly and abruptly rejected the derived of the constitutional party against his former ally. He summanly and abruptly rejected the derived of the constitutional party against his former ally. He summanly and the proconsulship, this demand, he added with blunt coarseness, seemed to hum no better than if a son it offer to fog his father. He approved in principle the formal of Marcellus, in so far as he too declared that he would private Caesar directly to attach the excelled his process shape.

He hinted, however, although without making any binding declaration on the point, that they would perhaps grant to Caesar admission to the elections for  $\frac{700}{48}$  without requiring his personal announcement, as well as the continuance of his governorship at the utmost to the 13th November 706. But in the meantime the incorrigible procrastinator consented to the postponement of the nomination of successors to the last day of February 704, which was asked by the representatives of Caesar, probably on the ground of a clause of the Pompeio-Licinian law forbidding any discussion in the senate as to the nomination of successors before the beginning of Caesar's last year of office.

To this effect accordingly the senate decreed (29th September 70.3). The filling up of the Gallic governorships was placed in the order of the day for the 1st March 303; but even now it was attempted to break up the army of Caesar-just as had formerly been done by decree of the people with the army of Lucullus (pp. 67, 96)—by inducing his veterans to apply to the senate for their discharge. Caesar's supporters effected, indeed, as far as they constitutionally could, the cancelling of these decrees by their tribunician veto; but Pompeius very distinctly declared that the magistrates were bound unconditionally to obey the senate, and that intercessions and similar antiquated formalities should produce no change. The oligarchical party, whose organ Pompeius now made himself, betrayed not obscurely the design, in the event of a victory, of revising the constitution in their sense and removing everything which had even the semblance of popular freedom; as indeed, doubtless for this reason, it omitted to avail itself of the comitia at all in its attacks directed against Caesar. The coalition between Pompeius and the constitutional party was thus formally declared; sentence too was already evidently passed on Caesar, and the term of its promulgation was simply postponed. The elections for the following year proved thoroughly adverse to him.

During these party manœuvres of his antagonists preparatory to war, Caesar had succeeded in getting rid of the Gallic insurrection and restoring the state of peace in the whole subject territory. As early as the summer of 703; under the convenient pretext of defending the frontier (p. 271) but evidently in token of the fact that the legions in Gaul were now beginning to be no longer needed there, he moved one of them to North Italy. He could not avoid perceiving now at any rate; if not earlier, that he would not be spared the necessity of drawing the sword against his fellow-citizens, nevertheless, as it was highly desirable to leave the legions still for a time in the barely pacified Gaul, he sought even yet to procrastinate, and, well acquainted with the extreme love of peace in the majority of the senate, did not abandon the hope of still restraining them from the declaration of war in spite of the pressure exercised over them by Pompeius He did not even hesitate to make great sacrifices, if only he might avoid for the present open vanance with the supreme governing board. When the senate (in the spring of 's'') at the suggestion of Pompeius requested both him and Caesar to furnish each a legion for the impending Parthian war (p 318) and when agreeably to this resolution Pompeius demanded back from Caesar the legion lent to him some years before, so as to send it to Syria, Caesar complied with the double demand, because neither the opportuneness of this decree of the senate nor the justice of the demard of Pompeius could in themselves be disputed, and the keeping within the bounds of the law and of formal loyalty was of more consequence to Caesar than a few thousand soldiers The two legions came without delay and placed themselves at the duposal of the government, but instead of sending them to the Euphrates, the latter kept them at Capua in readiness for Pompeius, and the public had once more the opportunity of companing the endeavours of Caesar to avoid a rupture with the

perfidious preparations for war of his opponents

permittions preparations for war of his opponents. For the discussions with the senate Laesar had succeeded in purchasing not only one of the consuls of the year, I decided a compared to the people Gavar Cuno, probably the most eminent among the many britant profligates of this epoch, 'unsurpassed in refined elegance, in fuent and clever oratory, in dextent of intrigue, and in that energy which in the case of vigorous but vicious characters bestim itself only the more powerfully amid the paints of kideness, but also unsurpassed in his dissolute life, in it is talent for botrowing—his debts were estimated at Lopeopous restreets (1600,000)—and in his moral and political want of principle. He had previously offered himself to be bought by Cariar and had been rejected, the talent, which he thereforward deplayed in his a tacks on Caesar, induced the latter subsequently to buy him up—the price was high, but the commod ty was worth the money.

I Home intermentation necessar (Lettel & 41)

Curio had in the first months of his tribunate of the people played the independent republican, and had as such thundered both against Caesar and against Pompeius. He availed himself with rare skill of the apparently impartial standing which this gave him, when in March  $\frac{7.04}{60}$  the proposal as to the filling up of the Gallic governorships for the next year came up afresh for discussion in the senate; he completely approved the decree, but asked that it should be at the same time extended to Pompeius and his extraordinary commands. His argumentsthat a constitutional state of things could only be brought about by the removal of all exceptional positions, that Pompeius as merely entrusted by the senate with the proconsulship could still less than Caesar refuse obedience to it, that the mere removal of one of the two generals would only increase the danger to the constitution—carried complete conviction to superficial politicians and to the public at large; and the declaration of Curio, that he intended to prevent any one-sided proceedings against Caesar by the veto constitutionally belonging to him, met with much approval in and out of the senate. Caesar declared his consent at once to Curio's proposal and offered to resign his governorship and command at any moment on the summons of the senate, provided Pompeius would do the same; he might safely do so, for Pompeius without his Italo-Spanish command was no longer to be feared. Pompeius again for that very reason could not but refuse; his reply—that Caesar must first resign, and that he meant speedily to follow the example thus set—was the less satisfactory, that he did not even specify a definite term for his retirement. Again the decision was delayed for months; Pompeius and the Catonians, perceiving the dubious humour of the majority of the senate, did not venture to bring Curio's proposal to a vote. Caesar employed the summer in establishing the state of peace in the regions which he had conquered, in holding a great review of his troops on the Scheldt, and in making a triumphal march through the province of North Italy which was entirely devoted to him; autumn found him in Ravenna, the southern frontier-town of his province. The vote which could no longer be delayed on Curio's pro-

The vote which could no longer be delayed on Curio's proposal at length took place, and exhibited the defeat of the party of Pompeius and Cato in all its extent. By 370 votes against 20 the senate resolved that the proconsuls of Spain and Gaul should both be called upon to resign their offices; and with boundless joy the good burgesses of Rome heard the glad news of the saving achievement of Curio. Pompeius was thus recalled by the senate no less than Caesar, and while Caesar was ready to comply with the command, Pompeus positively

latter belonging to the to the servile majority,

and it was, no doubt, vexatious to be taus beaten in their own camp and beaten by means of a phalanx of politoons. But where was victory to come from under a leader who, instead of shortly and distinctly dictating his orders to the senators, resorted in his old days a second time to the instructions of a professor of rhetoric, that with eloquence polished up afresh be might encounter the vigorous and brilliant talents of Curio?

The coalition, defeated in the senate, was in the most painful position. The Catonian section had undertaken to push matters to a rupture and to carry the senate along with them, and now saw their vessel stranded after a most vexatious manner on the , andbanks of the indolent majority Their leaders had to litten Andbanks of the indoient majority in their conferences to the bitterest reproaches from Pompeius,

he pointed out emphasemble and with entire justice the dancers of the seeming peace

to cut the knot hy they could never expect this from him, and that it i as they had promised, to bring matters to a crisis. After the champions of the constitution and of senatorial government had already declared the constitutional rights of the burgesses and of the tribunes of the people to be meaningless formalities (p 331), they now found themselves driven by necessity to trat the constitutional decisions of the secrete itself in a surfar manner and, as the legitimate government would not let use'l be saved with its own consent, to save it against its will. This was neither new nor accidental; Sulla (in 330) and Licelles (p. 58) had been obliged to early every energetic residures. conceived by them in the true interest of the government with a high hand irrespective of it, just as Cato and his freeze re-w proposed to do; the machinery of the constitution was in face utterly effete, and the senate was row-as the comi' a had been for conturies - nothing but a word out wheel al pring engrandy out of its track

It was remoured (October 1500) that Career had over 11 or legions from Transalpine into Cisalpine that and state only them at Placentia. This transference of to ope was of treef within the preopative of the powers of, Caroons recovery aboved in the senate the atter groundlessness of the committee of the commit and they by a majority rejected the proposal of the consul Gaius Marcellus to give Pompeius on the strength of it orders to march against Caesar. Yet the said consul, in concert with the two consuls elected for  $\frac{7.05}{4.9}$  who likewise belonged to the Catonian party, proceeded to Pompeius, and these three men by virtue of their own plenitude of power requested the general to put himself at the head of the two legions stationed at Capua, and to call the Italian militia to arms at his discretion. more informal authorisation for the commencement of a civil war can hardly be conceived; but people had no longer time to attend to such secondary matters; Pompeius accepted it. The military preparations, the levies, began; in order personally to forward them, Pompeius left the capital in December 704.

· Caesar had fully attained the object of devolving the initiative of civil war on his opponents. He had, while himself keeping on legal ground, compelled Pompeius to declare war, and to declare it not as representative of the legitimate authority, but as general of an openly revolutionary minority of the senate which overawed the majority. This result was not to be reckoned of slight importance, although the instinct of the masses could not and did not deceive itself for a moment as to the fact that the war concerned other things than questions of formal law. Now, when war was declared, it was Caesar's interest to strike a blow as soon as possible. The preparations of his opponents were just beginning, and even the capital was not occupied. In ten or twelve days an army three times as strong as the troops of Caesar that were in Upper Italy could be collected at Rome: but still it was not impossible to surprise the city undefended, or even perhaps' by a rapid winter campaign to seize all Italy, and to shut off the best resources of his opponents before they could make them available. The sagacious and energetic Curio, who after resigning his tribunate (10th December 704) had immediately gone to Caesar at Ravenna, vividly represented the state of things to his master; and it hardly needed such a representation to convince Caesar that longer delay now could only be injurious. But, as he with the view of not giving his antagonists occasion to complain had hitherto brought no troops to Ravenna itself, he could for the present do nothing but despatch orders to his whole force to set out with all haste; and he had to wait till at least the one legion stationed nearest reached Ravenna. Meanwhile he sent an ultimatum to Rome, which, if useful for nothing else, by its extreme submissiveness still farther compromised his opponents in public opinion perhaps even, as he seemed humself to hesitate, induced them to prosecute more remissly their preparations against him. In this ultimatum Caesar dropped all the counter-demands which he formerly made on Pompeius, and offered on his own part both to resign the governorship of Transalpine Gaul, and to dismiss eight of the ten legions belonging to him, at the term fixed by the senate, he declared himself content, if the senate would leave him either the governorship of Cisalpine Giul and Illyria with one, or that of Cisalpine Gaul alone with two, legions, not, forsooth, up to his investiture with the consulthin, but till after the close of the consular elections for If He thus consented to those proposals of accommodation, with which at the beginning of the discussions the senatorial party and even Pompeius himself had declared that they would be satisfed, and showed himself ready to remain in a private position from his election to the consulate down to his entering on office. Whether Caesar was in earnest with these astonishing concessions and had confidence that he should be able to carry through his game against Pompeius even after granting so much, or whether he reckoned that those on the other side had already 1 - there proposals of compromise more than an ed

to perform, any time, . been necepted, he would have made good his woru

Curso undertook once more to represent his master in the hon's den. In three days he made the journey from kaseman to Rome. When the new consuls Lucuss Levillus and Gara Marcellus the younger assembled the senate for the his in on 1st January 14%, he delivered in a full meeting the brite all dressed by the general to the senate. The tinbursa of it epople, Marcus Antonius, well known in the chronicle of carallal of the city as the intimate friend of Curso and his accompane and find a campaging as a brilliant causing officer, and Qurius Lating, Pompeius former quaerstor—the two, who were now in Curso standard and managing the cause of Caesar in Represenses sted in the translate reading of the despatch. The grave and clara and *To be distinguished from the consultancing the same parter of $750. De latter was a committe consul of $750 a broader, of the Burne Burne" is in which Caesar set forth the imminence of civil war, the general wish for peace, the arrogance of Pompeius, and his own yielding disposition, with all the irresistible force of truth; the proposals for a compromise, of a moderation which doubtless surprised his own partisans; the distinct declaration that this was the last time that he should offer his hand for peace-made the deepest impression. In spite of the dread inspired by the numerous soldiers of Pompeius who flocked into the capital, the sentiment of the majority was not doubtful; the consuls could not venture to let it find expression. Respecting the proposal renewed by Caesar that both generals might be enjoined to resign their commands simultaneously, respecting all the projects of ac-commodation suggested by his letter, and respecting the proposal made by Marcus Coelius Rufus and Marcus Calidius that Pompeius should be urged immediately to depart for Spain. the consuls refused—as they in the capacity of presiding officers were entitled to do-to let a vote take place. Even the proposal of one of their most decided partisans who was simply not so blind to the military position of affairs as his party, Marcus Marcellus—to defer the determination till the Italian levy en masse could be under arms and could protect the senate -was not allowed to be brought to a vote. Pompeius caused it to be declared through his usual organ, Quintus Scipio, that he was resolved to take up the cause of the senate now or never, and that he would let it drop if they longer delayed. The consul Lentulus said in plain terms that even the decree of the senate was no longer of consequence, and that, if it should persevere in its servility, he would act of himself and with his powerful friends take the farther steps necessary. Thus overawed, the majority decreed what was commanded—that Caesar should at a definite and not distant day give up Transalpine Gaul to Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, and Cisalpine Gaul to Marcus Servilius Novianus, and should dismiss his army, failing which he should be esteemed a traitor. When the tribunes of Caesar's party made use of their right of veto against this resolution, not only were they, as they at least asserted, threatened in the senate-house itself by the swords of Pompeian soldiers, and forced, in order to save their lives, to flee in slaves' clothing from the capital; but the now sufficiently overawed senate treated their formally quite constitutional interference as an attempt at revolution, declared the country in danger, and in the usual forms called the whole burgesses to take up arms, and all magistrates faithful to the constitution to place them sevies at the head of the armed (7th January 1967).

who was consul in 1,12

Book V

Now it was enough When Caesar was informed by the tribunes who had fled to his camp entreating protection as to the reception which his proposals had met with in the capital, he called together the soldiers of the thirteenth legion which had meanwhile arrived from its cantonments near Terreste (Trieste) at Ravenna, and unfolded before them the state of things It was not merely the man of genius versed in the knowledge and skilled in the control of men's hearts, whose brilliant eloquence shone forth and glowed in this agitating crisis of his own and the world a destiny, nor merely the generous commander in-chief and the victorious general addressing soldiers who had been called by himself to arms and for eight years had followed his banners with daily increasing enthus asm There spoke, above all, the energetic and consistent statesman, who had now for nine and twenty years defended the cause of freedom in good and exil times, who had brayed for it the dargers of assassins and the executioners of the anstocracy, the swords of the Germans and the waves of the unknown ocean without ever yielding or wavering, who had torn to pieces the Sullin constitution, had overthrown the rule of the senate, and had furnished the defenceless and unarmed democracy with protection and with arms by means of the struggle beyond the Alpa. And he spoke, not to the Clodian public whose regulifican enthusiasm had been long burnt down to aslies and does but to the young men from the towns and villages of Northern Italy, who still felt freshly and purely the riighty influence of the thought of civic freedom, who were still capable of fight of and of dving for ideals, who had themselves received for their country in a revolutionary was from Caesar the beingers or phile which the government refused to them; whom Cariar's fall would leave once more at the mercy of the ferrer, and wish already possessed practical proofs (p 330) of the max "al" use which the ol garchy proposed to make of these grant the Transpadanes buch were the fisteners before whem the great orator set forth the facts—the thanks for the ter prest of testal which the nobility were preparing for the general and he arms, the contemptuous setting ande of the comitise of everance of the serate, the sacred daty of protecting with arrend hand the tribunate of the people wrested five hundred sears are for their fathers, arms in hand, from the nobity, and of kergent the ancient eath which there had taken for them evers as to their children's children that they would man by man stand firm even to death for the tribunes of the people (i. 273). And then, when he—the leader and general of the popular party—summoned the soldiers of the people, now that conciliatory means had been exhausted and concession had reached its utmost limits, to follow him in the last, the inevitable, the decisive struggle against the equally hated and despised, equally perfidious and incapable, and in fact ludicrously incorrigible aristocracy—there was not an officer or a soldier who could hold back. The order was given for departure; at the head of his vanguard Caesar crossed the narrow brook which separated his province from Italy, and which the constitution forbade the proconsul of Gaul to pass. When after nine years' absence he trod once more the soil of his native land, he trod at the same time the path of revolution. "The die was cast,"

CHAP. IX. Rupture between Joint Rulers 339

CHAPTER X

BRUNDISIUM, ILERDA, PHARSALUS, AND THAPSUS

Arms were thus to decide which of the two rien who had hitherto jointly ruled Rome was now to be its sole ruler. Let us see what were the comparative resources at the disposal of Caesar and Pompeius for the impending struggle

Caesar's power rested primarily on the wholly unlimited authority which he enjoyed within his own party. If the ideas of democracy and of monarchy met together in it, this was not the result of a coalition which had been accident ally entered into and might be accidentally dissolved, on the contrary it was involved in the very essence of a democracy without a representative constitution, that democracy and monarchy should find in Caesar at once their highest and ulti mate expression In political as in military matters throughout the first and the final decision lay with Cartar high the honour in which he field any serviceable instrument, it remained an instrument still, Caesar stood in his own part without confederates, surrounded only by military political adjutants, who as a rule had risen from the army and as sold ers were trained never to ask the reason and purpose of anything, but unconditionally to obey On this account especially, at the decisive moment when the civil war legan, of all the officers and soldiers of Caesar one alone refused him obedience, and the circumstance that that one was precisely the foremost of them all, simply confirms this view of the relation of Cariat to b s adherents

Titus Labienus had shared with Caesar all the truth'es of the dark times of Catilina (p. 149) as well as all the lastre of the

was the cliest, allers, and ear the cliest, allers, and the control of the contro

vass for the

entered into communication with the opposite party, resorted at the beginning of hostilities in  $\frac{7.05}{4.8}$  to the head-quarters of Pompeius instead of those of Caesar, and fought through the whole civil strife with unparalleled bitterness against his old friend and master in war. We are not sufficiently informed either as to the character of Labienus or as to the special circumstances of his changing sides; but in the main his case certainly presents nothing but a further proof of the fact, that a military chief can reckon far more surely on his captains than on his marshals. To all appearance Labienus was one of those persons who combine with military efficiency utter incapacity as statesmen, and who in consequence, if they unhappily choose or are compelled to take part in politics, are exposed to those strange paroxysms of giddiness, of which the history of Napoleon's marshals supplies so many tragi-comic examples. He may probably have thought himself entitled to rank alongside of Caesar as a second chief of the democracy; and the rejection of this claim of his may have sent him over to the camp of his opponents. His case rendered for the first time apparent the whole gravity of the evil, that Caesar's treatment of his officers as adjutants without independence admitted of the rise of no men fitted to undertake a separate command in his camp, while at the same time he stood urgently in need of such men amidst the diffusion—which might easily be foreseen -of the civil war through all the provinces of the wide empire. But this disadvantage was far outweighed by that unity in the supreme leadership, which was the primary condition of all success, and a condition only to be preserved at such a cost.

This unity of leadership acquired its full power through the efficiency of its instruments. Here the army comes, first of all, into view. It still numbered nine legions of infantry or at the most 50,000 men, all of whom however had faced the enemy and two-thirds had served in all the campaigns against the Celts. The cavalry consisted of German and Noric mercenaries, whose usefulness and trustworthiness had been proved in the war against Vercingetorix. The eight years' warfare, full of varied vicissitudes against the Celtic nation—which was brave, although in a military point of view greatly inferior to the Italian—had given Caesar the opportunity of organising his army as he alone knew how to organise it. The whole efficiency of the soldier presupposes due physical vigour; in Caesar's levies more regard was had to the strength and activity of the recruits than to their means or their morals. But the serviceableness of an sparing use of the cavalry. In the other provinces and the neighbouring half or wholly independent states Caesar had indeed attempted to procure for himself support, had lavished nich presents on the princes, caused great buildings to be executed in various towns, and granted to them in case of need financial and military assistance; but on the whole, of course, not much had been gained by the German and Celius prince the Danube-particularly the Voctio, so important for the rectuting of catalry-were probably the only relations of this sort which were of any moment for him.

While Caesar thus entered the struggle only as commandant of Gaul, without other essential resources than efficient adjutants, a faithful army, and a devoted province, Pompeus began it as the de facto chief of the Roman commonwealth, and in full possession of all the resources that stood at the disposal of the legitimate government of the great Roman empire. But while his position was in a political and military point of were far more considerable, it was also on the other hand far less defaute and firm. The unity of leadership, which resulted of litell and by necessity from the position of Caesar, was inconsistent with the nature of a coalition; and although Portpetts, too much of a soldier to be deceived as to its being indispensable, yet the senate itself could hot on see Anna .

and therefore doubly injurious interference with the military,

or thankly tec-

that the first consequence of the victory when abbeyind we be a rupture between the victors; the contempt which the entertained for each other and with only too goal ground in either case; the inconvenient number of respective a influential men in the ranks of the autocracy and the influence in the ranks of the autocracy and the influence in the ranks of the autocracy and the influence in the ranks of the autocracy and the ranks are presented of Carria a refluctant and refractory co-operation, which found a visual centrals to the harmonious and compact arts of the other side.

. While all the disadvantages incident to the coalition of powers naturally hostile were thus felt in an unusual measure by Caesar's antagonists, this coalition was certainly still a very considerable power. It had exclusive command of the sea; all ports, all ships of war, all the materials for equipping a fleet were at its disposal. The two Spains—as it were the home of the power of Pompeius just as the two Gauls were the home of that of Caesar-were faithful adherents to their master and in the hands of able and trustworthy administrators. In the other provinces also, of course with the exception of the two Gauls, the posts of the governors and commanders had during recent years been filled up with safe men under the influence of Pompeius and the minority of the senate. The client-states throughout and with great decision took part against Caesar and in favour of Pompeius. The most important princes and cities had been brought into the closest personal relations with Pompeius during the different sections of his manifold activity. In the war against the Marians, for instance, he had been the companion in arms of the kings of Numidia and Mauretania and had re-established the kingdom of the former (iii. 324); in the Mithradatic war, in addition to a number of other minor principalities temporal and spiritual, he had re-established the kingdoms of Bosporus, Armenia, and Cappadocia, and created that of Deiotarus (pp. 129; 133, 134); it was primarily at his instigation that the Egyptian war was undertaken, and it was by his adjutant that the rule of the Lagidae had been fortified afresh (p. 144). Even the city of Massilia in Caesar's own province, while indebted to the latter doubtless for various favours, was indebted to Pompeius at the time of the Sertorian war for a very considerable extension of territory (p. 199); and, besides, the ruling oligarchy there stood in natural alliancestrengthened by various mutual relations—with the oligarchy in But these personal motives and relations as well as the glory pertaining to the victor in three continents, which in these more remote parts of the empire far outshone that of the conqueror of Gaul, did perhaps less harm to Caesar in those quarters than the views and designs—which had not remained unknown to them-of the heir of Gaius Gracchus as to the necessity of uniting the dependent states and the usefulness of provincial colonisations. No one of the dependent dynasts found himself more imminently threatened by this peril than Juba king of Numidia. Not only had he years before, in the lifetime of his father Hiempsal, fallen into a vehement personal quarrel with

Caesar, but recently the same Curio, who now occupied almost the first place among Caesar's adjutants, had proposed to the Roman burgesses the annexation of the Aumidian Lingdor-Lastly, if matters should go so far as to lead the independent neighbouring states to interfere in the Roman civil war, the only state of real power, that of the Parthians, was practically already allied with the aristocratic party by the connection entered in's (70), while Caesar was far too

for party interests with the

As to Italy the great majority of the burgesses were as has been already mentioned, averse to Caesar-more especially of course the whole anstocracy with their very considerable following but also in a not much less degree the great capital its who could not hope in the event of a thorough reform of the commonwealth to preserve their partisan jury-courts and the " monopoly of extortion Of equally anti-democratic sentimen $ were the small capitalists, the landholders and generally a l classes that had anything to lose but in these ranks of life the cares of the next rent term and of sowing and reaping out weighed, as a rule, every other consideration The army at the disposal of Pompeius consisted el way of the Spanish troops, seven legions inured to war and in every respect reliable.

-weak indeed.

found in Syna 1 In Italy there were under arms at the outset on v the two legions recently given off by Caesar, whose effective strength did not amount to more than 7,000 men, and whose trust worthiness was more than doubtful because-levied in Citizene Gaul and old comrades in arris of Cariat-they were to a fat degree displeased at the unbecoming intrigue by which they I we been made to clange camps (p 332) and recall 1 m 1 1 eges their general who I ad reagnerances by pa I to them be' m' as I at their departure the presents which were processed to every soldier for the triumph But, apart from the circums an + that the St anul troops right arrive in Italy with the spring e by the land route if rough Gaul or ly sea the more of t + 12 me legions s' il remaining from the levies of "it (p. 171) as well as the Italian levy swom to all emance in Hill p tite the recalled from their finds at the olong their they were! troops standing at the disposal of Persons on the at the without recooning the seven legions in spain a let service in other provinces, amounted in Italy alone to ten legions 1 or about 60,000 men, so that it was no exaggeration at all, when Pompeius asserted that he had only to stamp with his foot to cover the ground with armed men. It is true that it required some interval—though but short—to render these soldiers available; but the arrangements for this purpose as well as for the carrying out of the new levies ordered by the senate in consequence of the outbreak of the civil war were already everywhere in progress. Immediately after the decisive decree of the senate (7th January  $\frac{705}{49}$ ), in the very depth of winter the most eminent men of the aristocracy set out to the different districts, to hasten the calling up of recruits and the preparation of arms. The want of cavalry was much felt, as for this arm they had been accustomed to rely wholly on the provinces and especially on the Celtic contingents; to make at least a beginning, three hundred gladiators belonging to Caesar were taken from the training schools of Capua and mounted-a step which however met with so general disapproval, that Pompeius again broke up this troop and levied in room of it 300 horsemen from the mounted slave-herdmen of Apulia.

The state-treasury was at a low ebb as usual; they busied themselves in supplementing the inadequate amount of cash out of the local treasuries and even from the temple-treasures of the municipia.

Under these circumstances the war opened at the beginning of January 7.05. Of troops capable of marching Caesar had not more than a legion—5000 infantry and 300 cavalry—at Ravenna, which was by the highway some 240 miles distant from Rome; Pompeius had two weak legions—7000 infantry and a small squadron of cavalry—under the orders of Appius Claudius at Luceria, from which, likewise by the highway, the distance was just about as great to the capital. The other troops of Caesar, leaving out of account the raw divisions of recruits still in course of formation, were stationed, one half on the Saone and Loire, the other half in Belgia, while Pompeius' Italian reserves were already arriving from all sides at their rendezvous; long before even the first of the Transalpine divisions of Caesar could arrive in Italy, a far superior army could not but be ready to receive it there. It seemed folly, with a band of the strength of that of Catilina and for the moment without any effective reserve, &lt;sup>1</sup> This number was specified by Pompeius himself (Caesar, B. C. i. 6), and it agrees with the fact, that he lost in Italy about 60 cohorts or 30,000 men, and took 25,000 over to Greece (Caesar, B. C. iii. 10).

incress
he spins
ostpored
une the

offersive in Transalpine, and his Italian troops in Cisalp regard, and Pompeius, a match for Caesar in tractics and superior to him in experience, was a formidable antagonist in such a campaign running its regular course. Now perhaps, occusioned as he vas to operate slowly and surely with superior masses, be might be disconcerted by a wholly improvised attack, and that which could not greatly discompose Caesar's thirteenth learn after the severe trial of the Gallie surprise and the Janian campaign in the land of the Bellovaci (p. 263)—the suddenness of the war and the toil of a winter campaign—could into the disorganise the Pompeian corps consisting of old solders of Caesar or of ill trained recruits, and still only in the course of formation.

Accordingly Caesar advanced into Italy 1 Two h ; hways led at that time from the Romagna to the south, the Armi're Cassian which led from Bononia over the Apennines to Arretized and Rome, and the Popillio-Flaminian, which led form Ravenna along the coast of the Adriatic to Fanuen and was there divided, one branch running westward through the Furlo pass to Reme, another southward to Ancora and therce onward to Area a On the former Marcus Antonius advanced as far as Arr time? on the second Caesar himself pushed forward. Res stance was nowhere encountered, the recruiting off cers of qual or had no military skill their bands of recruis were no anders, the inhabitants of the country towns were only arxive rot to be involved in a siege. When Curio with 1500 men approximated Iguvium, where a couple of thousand Umbrum rect. " had assembled under the practor Questus Memerus There I greek and soldiers took to flight at the bare ti lings of his appender, and similar results on a small scale everywhere entred

Cresar had to choose whether he would main any net Pome, from which his cavalre at Arreium were already under about 230 miles distant, or aguinst the legicins encamped at large a

The dicre of the smale was passed in the vidit; see indicated in the literal all eater the several date is well in it one that there is but consect the lendary (Co and for a time for a time of a time and at the very least three days if only not led at the very least three days if only not led at the lendary (Co and for a time that all associations and the least that all associations are also that the least that all associations are also associated to be a second to b

He chose the latter plan. The consternation of the opposite party was boundless. Pompeius received the news of Caesar's advance at Rome; he seemed at first disposed to defend the capital, but, when the tidings arrived of Caesar's entrance into the Picenian territory and of his first successes there, he abandoned Rome and ordered its evacuation. A panic, augmented by the false report that Caesar's cavalry had appeared before the gates, came over the world of quality. The senators, who had been informed that every one who should remain behind in the capital would be treated as an accomplice of the rebel Caesar, flocked in crowds out at the gates. The consuls themselves had so totally lost their senses, that they did not even secure the treasure; when Pompeius called upon them to fetch it, for which there was sufficient time, they returned the reply that they would deem it safer, if he should first occupy Picenum. All was perplexity; consequently a great council of war was held in Teanum Sidicinum (23rd January), at which Pompeius, Labienus, and both consuls were present. First of all proposals of accommodation from Caesar were again submitted; even now he declared himself ready at once to dismiss his army, to hand over his provinces to the successors nominated, and to become a candidate in the regular way for the consulship provided that Pompeius were to depart for Spain, and Italy were to be disarmed. The answer was, that if Caesar would immediately return to his province, they would bind themselves to procure the disarming of Italy and the departure of Pompeius by a decree of the senate to be passed in due form in the capital; perhaps this reply was intended not as a bare artifice to deceive, but as an acceptance of the proposal of compromise; it was, however, in reality the opposite. The personal conference with Pompeius desired by Caesar the former declined, and could not but decline, that he might not by the semblance of a new coalition with Caesar provoke still more the distrust already felt by the constitutional party. Concerning the management of the war it was agreed in Teanum that Pompeius should take the command of the troops stationed at Luceria, on which notwithstanding their untrustworthiness all hope depended; that he should advance with these into his own and Labienus' native country, Picenum; that he should personally call the general levy there to arms, as he had done some thirty-five years ago (iii. 312), and should attempt at the head of the faithful Picentine cohorts and the veterans formerly under Caesar to set a limit to the advance of the enemy.

Everything depended on whether Picenum would hold ouuntil Pompeius came up to its defence Already Caesar with his reunited army had penetrated into it along the coase road by way of Ancona Here too the preparations were in fall course, in the very northernmost Picenian town textmum a considerable band of recruits was collected under Publius Attn.s Varus, but at the entreaty of the municipality Varus evacuated the town even before Caesar appeared, and a handful of Caesar s soldiers which overtook the troop not far from Auximum to ally dispersed it after a brief conflict-the first in this war. In like manner soon afterwards Gaius Lucilius Hirrus with 3000 men evacuated Camerinum, and Publius Lentulus Spinther with 5000 Asculum The men, thoroughly devoted to Perspetts willingly for the most part left their houses and farms, and followed their leaders over the frontier, but the district 13.11 was already fost, when the officer sent by Pompeus for the temporary conduct of the defence, Lucius Vibulius Ru'asno genteel senator, but a soldier expenenced in war-arrived there, he had to content himself with taking the s x or seven thousand recruits who were saved away from the incapal of recruiting officers, and conducting them for the time to the nearest rendezvous

This was Corfinium, the place of meeting for the leves in the Albensian, Marsian and Parlignian territories, the body of

recruits here assemb

flower of the army party. When Vibilius arrived here, Caesar was s'ul several days' march behind, there was nothing to prevent but free immediately starting agreeably to Pompeiss' metrur per and conducting the saved Preentine recruits along with it was embled at Confinium to join the main army in tip. A. Let the commandant in Confinium to join the main army in tip. A. Let the commandant in Confinium was the despitate forecast if the Caesar in the governorship of Transalpine Gad, Luce viken, if, one of the rices to arrow raiseded and studburn of the formation and the market and we refused to everyle with the color of Pompeius, but ally prevented vilid is story and the not only refused to everyle with the color of Pompeius, but ally prevented vilid is story and refused and the properties of the period of Pompeius and the prevented vilid is story and refused the properties of the second properties of the second might perhaps apply his two untrustworthy legions as a support to the Picentine general levy, he could not with them alone offer battle to Caesar. Instead of him after a few days Caesar came: (14th February). His troops had been joined in Picenum by the twelfth, and before Corfinium by the eighth, legion from beyond the Alps, and, besides these, three new legions had been formed partly from the Pompeian men that were taken prisoners or presented themselves voluntarily, partly from the recruits that were at once levied everywhere; so that Caesar before Corfinium was already at the head of an army of 40,000 men, half of whom had seen service. So long as Domitius hoped for the arrival of Pompeius, he caused the town to be defended: when the letters of Pompeius had at length undeceived him, he resolved, not forsooth to persevere at the forlorn post-by which he would have rendered the greatest; service to his party-nor even to capitulate, but, while the common soldiers were informed that relief was close at hand, to make his own escape along with his noble officers during the next night. Yet he had not the judgment to carry into effect even this pretty scheme. confusion of his behaviour betrayed him. A part of the men began to mutiny; the Marsian recruits, who held such an infamy on the part of their general to be impossible, wished to fight against the mutineers; but they too were obliged reluctantly to believe the truth of the accusation, whereupon the whole garrison arrested their staff and handed it, themselves, and the town over to Caesar (20th February). The corps in Alba, 3000 strong, and 1500 recruits assembled in Tarracina, thereupon laid down their arms, as soon as Caesar's patrols of cavalry appeared; a third division in Sulmo of 3500 men had been previously compelled to surrender.

Pompeius had given up Italy as lost so soon as Caesar had occupied Picenum; only he wished to delay his embarkation as long as possible, with the view of saving so much of his force as could still be saved. Accordingly he had slowly put himself in motion for the nearest seaport, Brundisium. Thither came the two legions of Luceria and such recruits as Pompeius had been able hastily to collect in the deserted Apulia, as well as the troops raised by the consuls and other commissioners in Campania and conducted in all haste to Brundisium; thither too resorted a number of political fugitives, including the most distinguished of the senators accompanied by their families. The embarkation began; but the vessels at hand did not suffice to transport all at once the whole multitude, which still amounted to 25,000 persons No course remained but to divide the arm). The larger half went first (4th March), with the smaller division of some 10,000 men Fompeius awaited at Brundisture the return of the fleet, for, however desirable the possession of Brund sum might be for a contingent attempt to recover Italy, they did not venture to hold the place permanently against Caesar Meanwhile Caesar arrived before Brundisium, the siege began. Caesar attempted first of all to close the mouth of the harbour by moles and floating bridges, with a view to exclude the returning fleet, but Pompeius caused the trading vessels lying in the harbour to be armed, and managed to present the complete closing of the harbour until the fleet appeared, and the troopswhom Pompeius with great dextenty, in spite of the vinlance of the besiegers and the hostile feeling of the inhabitants, withdrew from the town to the last man unharmed-were carned off beyond Caesar's reach to Greece (17th March) The further pursuit, like the siege itself, failed for want of a fleet

In a campaign of two months, without a single serious creaze ment, Caesar had so broken up an arm of the legion, that less than the half of it had with great difficulty ecaped in a confused flight across the sea, and the whole Italian peninsula, including the capital with the state-that and all the stores accumulated there, had fallen into the power of the victor Not without reason did the beaten party bewail the terrible rapidity, sagnesty, and energy of the 'monster"

But it may be questioned whether Caesar gained or lost river by the conquest of Italy In a military respect, no doub', very considerable resources were now not merch withfrawn from his opponents, but rendered available for himself, even in the spring of the his army embraced, in consequence of the levies en masse instituted every where a considerable number of legens of recruits in addition to the nine old ones like on the other hand it now became necessary not merely to leave better a considerable garrison in Italy, but also to take requirer are not the closing of the transmarine traffic centerplated by his opponents who cor manded the sea, and against the far as with which the capital was consequently threatened, wherely Carrair's already sufficiently complicated mutary tail was complicated further will I marcialts to was certainly of unportance that Carrar had the good fortune to obtain presents in of the stock of remove in the capital, but the promoted we mee el income and particularly the ferre are from the last were in the hands of the energy, and, in corresponds of the great increased demands for the army and the new obligation to provide for the starving population of the capital, the considerable sums which were found quickly melted away. Caesar soon found himself compelled to appeal to private credit, and, as it seemed that he could not possibly gain any long respite by this means, extensive confiscations were generally anticipated as the only remaining expedient.

More serious difficulties still were created by the political relations amidst which Caesar found himself placed on the conquest of Italy. The apprehension of an anarchical revolution was universal among the propertied classes. Friends and foes saw in Caesar a second Catilina; Pompeius believed or affected to believe that Caesar had been driven to civil war merely by the impossibility of paying his debts. This was certainly absurd; but in fact Caesar's antecedents were anything but reassuring, and still less reassuring was the aspect of the retinue that now surrounded him. Individuals of the most broken reputation, notorious personages like Quintus Hortensius, Gaius Curio, Marcus Antonius-the latter the stepson of the Catilinarian Lentulus who was executed by the orders of Cicero -were the most prominent actors in it; the highest posts of trust were bestowed on men who had long ceased even to reckon up their debts; people saw men who held office under Caesar not merely keeping dancing-girls-which was done by others also-but appearing publicly in company with them. Was there any wonder, that even grave and politically impartial men expected amnesty for all exiled criminals, cancelling of creditors' claims, comprehensive mandates of confiscation, proscription, and murder, nay, even a plundering of Rome by the Gallic soldiery?

But in this respect the "monster" deceived the expectations of his foes as well as of his friends. As soon even as Caesar occupied the first Italian town, Ariminum, he prohibited all common soldiers from appearing armed within the walls; the country towns were protected from injury throughout and without distinction, whether they had given him a friendly or hostile reception. When the mutinous garrison surrendered Corfinium late in the evening, he in the face of every military consideration postponed the occupation of the town till the following morning, solely that he might not abandon the burgesses to the nocturnal invasion of his exasperated soldiers. Of the prisoners the common soldiers, as presumably indifferent to politics, were incorporated with his own army, while the officers were not merely spared, but also freely dismissed without distinction of person and without the exaction of any promises whatever; and all which they claimed as private property was frankly given up to them, without even investigating with any strictness the warrant for their claims. Lucius Domitius himself was thus treated, and even Labienus had the money and baggage which he had left behind sent after him to the enemy's camp. In the most painful financial embarrassment the immense estates of his opponents whether present or absent were not assailed; indeed Caesar preferred to borrow from friends, rather than that he should stir up the holders of property against him even by exacting the formally admissible, but practically antiquated, land tax (iii 371). The victor regarded only the half, and that not the more difficult half, of his task as solved with the victory; he saw the security for its duration, according to his own expression, only in the unconditional pardon of the anquished, and had accordingly during the whole march from Ravenna to Brundisium incessantly renewed his efforts to bring about a personal conference with Pompeius and a tolerable accorrmodation.

But, if the aristocracy had previously refused to listen to reconciliation, the unexpected and withal so disgrareful emigra-

scamp of the emigrants to their friends left behind in Italy were Itali of projects for confiscations and proscriptions, of plans for purifying the senate and the state, compared with which the restoration of Sulla was child's play, and which even the moderate men of their own party heard with horror. The frantic passion of impotence, the wise moderation of power, produced their effect. The whole mass, in whose eyes material interests were superior to political, threw itself into the arms of Carsar. The country towns idolised "the upnghtness, the moderation, the prudence" of the victor; and even opponents conceded that these testimonies of respect were meant in earnest. The great capitalists, farmers of the taxes, and jurymen, showed no special desire, after the severe shipwreck which had befallen the constitutional party in Italy, to entrust themselves farther to the same pilots; capital returned to the light, and "the rich lords resorted again to their daily task of writing their rent rolls." Even the great majority of the senate, at least numerically speaking-for certainly but few of the nobler and more influential members of the senate were included in it—had notwithstanding the orders of Pompeius and of the consuls remained behind in Italy, and a portion of them even in the capital itself; and they acquiesced in Caesar's rule. The moderation of Caesar, well calculated even in its very semblance of excess, attained its object: the trembling anxiety of the propertied classes as to the impending anarchy was in some measure allayed. This was doubtless an incalculable gain for the future; the prevention of anarchy, and of the scarcely less dangerous alarm of anarchy, was the indispensable preliminary to the future reorganisation of the commonwealth.

But at the moment this moderation was more dangerous for Caesar than the renewal of the Cinnan and Catilinarian fury would have been; it did not convert enemies into friends, and it converted friends into enemies. Caesar's Catilinarian adherents were indignant that murder and pillage remained in abeyance; these audacious and desperate personages, some of whom were men of talent, might be expected to prove cross and untractable. The republicans of all shades, on the other hand, were neither converted nor propitiated by the leniency of the conqueror. According to the creed of the Catonian party, duty towards what they called their fatherland absolved them from every other consideration; even one who owed freedom and life to Caesar remained entitled and in duty bound to take up arms or at least to engage in plots against him. The less decided sections of the constitutional party were no doubt ready to accept peace and protection from the new monarch; nevertheless they ceased not to curse the monarchy and the monarch at heart. The more clearly the change of the constitution became manifest, the more distinctly the great majority of the burgesses—both in the capital with its keener susceptibility of political excitement, and among the more energetic population of the country and country towns—awoke to a consciousness of their republican sentiments; so far the friends of the constitution in Rome reported with truth to their brethren of kindred views in exile, that at home all classes and all persons were friendly to Pompeius. The discontented temper of all these circles was further increased by the moral pressure, which the more decided and more notable men who shared such views exercised from their very position as emigrants over the multitude of the humbler and more lukewarm. The conscience of the honourable man smote him in regard to his remaining in Italy; the half-aristocrat fancied that he was ranked among the plebeians if he did not go into exile with the Domitii and the Metelli, and even if he took his seat in the Caesarian senate of nobodies The victor's special elemency gave to this silent opposition increased political importance, seeing that Caesar abstained from terrorism, it seemed as if his secret opponents could display their disinclination to his rule without much danger.

Very soon he experienced remarkable treatment in this respect at the hands of the senate Caesar had begun the struggle to liberate the overawed senate from its oppressors This was done, consequently he wished to obtain from the senate approval of what had been done, and full powers for the continuance of the war For this purpose, when Caesar appeared before the capital (end of March) the tribunes of his party convoked for him the senate (1st April) The meeting was tolerably numerous, but the more notable of the very senators that remained in Italy were absent, including even the former leader of the servile majority Marcus Cicero and Caesar's own father in law Lucius Piso, and, what was vorse, those who did appear were not inclined to enter into Caesar s proposals When Caesar spoke of full power to continue the war, one of the only two consulars present, Servius Sulpicius Rufus, a very tunid man who desired nothing but a quiet death in his bed, was of opinion that Caesar would deserve well of his country if he should abandon the thought of carrying the wir to Greece and Spain When Caesar thereupon requested the senate at least to the medium of transmitting his peace proposals to Pompeius, they were not indeed opposed to that course in itself, but the threats of the emigrants against the neutrals had so terrified the latter, that no one was found to undertake the message of peace Through the disinclination of the aristocracs to help the erection of the monarch's throne, and through the same mertness of the dignified corporation, by means of which Caesar had shortly before frustrated the legal nomination of Pompeius as generalissimo in the civil war, he too was non thwarted when making a like request Other impediments, moreover, occurred Caesar desired, with the view of regulating in some sort of war his position, to be named dictator, but his wish was no cornplied with, because such a magistrate could only be constitut announted by one of the consuls, and the attempt of Metellus, moreover, lodged a protest against all the steps of the proconsul, and made signs as though he would protect with his person the public chest, when Caesar's men came to empty it. Caesar could not avoid in this case ordering that the inviolable person should be pushed aside as gently as possible; otherwise, he kept by his purpose of abstaining from all violent steps. He declared to the senate, just as the constitutional party had done shortly before, that he had certainly desired to regulate things in a legal way and with the help of the supreme authority; but, since this help was refused, he could dispense with it.

Without further concerning himself about the senate and the formalities of state law, he handed over the temporary administration of the capital to the praetor Marcus Aemilius Lepidus as city-prefect, and made the requisite arrangements for the administration of the provinces that obeyed him and the continuance of the war. Even amidst the din of the gigantic struggle, and with all the alluring sound of Caesar's lavish promises, it still made a deep impression on the multitude of the capital, when they saw in their free Rome the monarch for the first time exercising a monarch's prerogative and breaking open the doors of the treasury by his soldiers. But the times had gone by when the impressions and feelings of the multitude determined the course of events; it was with the legions that the decision lay, and a few painful feelings more or less were in fact of no farther moment.

Caesar hastened to resume the war. He owed his successes hitherto to the offensive, and he intended still to maintain it. The position of his antagonist was singular. After the original plan of carrying on the campaign simultaneously in the two Gauls by offensive operations from the bases of Italy and Spain had been frustrated by Caesar's aggressive, Pompeius had intended to go to Spain. There he had a very strong position. The army amounted to seven legions; a large number of Pompeius' veterans served in it, and several years of conflicts in the Lusitanian mountains had hardened soldiers and officers. Among its captains Marcus Varro indeed was simply a celebrated scholar and a faithful partisan; but Lucius Afranius had fought with distinction in the East and in the Alps, and Marcus Petreius, the conqueror of Catilina, was an officer as dauntless as he was able. While in the Further province Caesar had still various adherents from the time of his governorship there (p. 198), the more important province of the Ebro was attached by all the ties of veneration and gratitude to the celebrated general, who twenty years before had held the command in it during the Sertorian war, and after the termination of that war had organised it anew. Pompeius could evidently after the Italian disaster do nothing better than proceed to Spain with the saved remnant of his army, and then at the head of his whole force advance to meet Caesar. But unfortunately he had, in the hope of being able still to save the troops that were in Corfinium, tarried in Apulia so long that he was compelled to choose the nearer Brundisium as his place of embarkation instead of the Campanian ports. Why, master as he was of the sea and Sicily. he did not subsequently revert to his original plan, cannot be determined; probably the aristocracy after their short-sighted and distrustful fashion showed no desire to commit themselves to the Spanish troops and the Spanish population. At any rate Pompeius remained in the East, and Caesar had the option of directing his first attack either against the army which was being organised in Greece under Pompeius' own command, or against that which was ready for battle under his lieutenants in Spain. He had decided in favour of the latter course, and, as soon as the Italian campaign ended, had taken measures to collect on the lower Rhone nine of his best legions, as also 6000 cavalry-partly men individually picked out by Caesar in the . Celtic cantons, partly German mercenaries-and a number of · and Ligurian archers.

But at this point his opponents also had been active. Lucius Donitius, who was nominated by the senate in Caesar's stead as governor of Transalpine Gaul, had proceeded from Corfinium—as soon as Caesar had released him—along with his attendants and with Pompeius' confidant Lucius Vibullius Rufus to Massilia, and actually induced that city to declare for Pompeius and even to refuse a passage to Caesar's troops. Of the Spanish troops the two least trustworthy legions were left behind under the command of Varro in the Further province; while the five best, rein'—and hy 40,000 Spanish infantry—partly Celtiberian infe

nnc numited by

Vibullius, set out to Look.

Meanwhile Caesar himself arrived in Gau mu, as the coramencement of the siege of Massilia still detained him in person, he immediately despatched the greater part of his troops assembled on the Rhone-six legions and the cavalry—along the great road leading by way of Narbo (Narbonne) to. Rhode (Rosas) with the view of anticipating the enemy at the Pyrenees. The movement was successful; when Afranius and Petreius arrived at the passes, they found them already occupied by the Caesarians and the line of the Pyrenees lost. They then took up a position at Ilerda (Lerida) between the Pyrenees and the Ebro. This town lies twenty miles to the north of the Ebro on the right bank of one of its tributaries, the Sicoris (Segre), which was crossed by only a single solid bridge immediately at Ilerda. To the south of Ilerda the mountains which adjoin the left bank of the Ebro approach pretty close to the town; to the northward there stretches on both sides of the Sicoris a level country which is commanded by the hill on which the town is built. For an army, which had to submit to a siege, it was an excellent position; but the defence of Spain, after the occupation of the line of the Pyrenees had been neglected, could only be undertaken in earnest behind the Ebro, and, as no secure communication was established between Ilerda and the Ebro, and no bridge existed over the latter stream, the retreat from the temporary to the true defensive position was not sufficiently secured. The Caesarians established themselves above Ilerda, in the delta which the river Sicoris forms with the Cinga (Cinca), which unites with it below Ilerda; but the attack only began in earnest after Caesar had arrived in the camp (23rd June). Under the walls of the town the struggle was maintained with equal exasperation and equal valour on both sides, and with frequent alternations of success; but the Caesarians did not attain their object—which was, to establish themselves between the Pompeian camp and the town and thereby to possess themselves of the stone bridge-and they consequently remained dependent for their communication with Gaul solely on two bridges which they had hastily constructed over the Sicoris, bridged over, about eighteen or twenty miles farther up.

CHAP. X.

When the floods came on with the melting of the snow, these temporary bridges were swept away; and, as they had no vessels for the passage of the highly swollen rivers and under such circumstances the restoration of the bridges could not for the present be thought of, the Caesarian army was confined to the narrow space between the Cinca and the Sicoris, while the left bank of the Sicoris and with it the road, by which the army communicated with Gaul and Italy, were exposed almost and, as the river at Ilerda itself was too considerable to be

undefended to the Pompeians, who passed the over partly by the town-bridge, partly by swimming after the Lusitanian fashion on skins. It was the season shortly before harvest; the old produce was almost used up, the new was not yet gathered, and the narrow strip of land between the two streams was soon exhausted. In the camp actual famine prevailedthe modius of wheat cost 50 denarii (£1 16s.)—and dangerous diseases broke out; whereas on the left bank there were accumuwell as troops of all officers a mass of 6000 men, wholh the 1 force and drove with great loss to the mountains, while the Caesarians on the right bank were obliged to remain passive spectators of the unequal conflict. The communications of the army were in the hands of the Pompeians; in Italy the accounts from Spain suddenly ceased, and the suspicious rumours which began to circulate there were not so very remote from the truth. Had the Pompeians followed up their advantage with some energy, they could not have failed either to reduce under their power or at least to drive back towards Gaul the mass scarcely capable of resistance which was crowded together on the left bank of the Sicoris, and to occupy this bank so completely that not a man could cross the river without their knowledge. But both points were neglected; those bands were doubtless forced off with loss but neither destroyed nor completely beaten back, and the prevention of the crossing of the river was left substantially to the river itself. Thereupon Caesar formed his plan. He ordered portable boats of a light wooden frame and osier work lined with leather, after the model of those used in the Channel among the Britons and subsequently by the Saxons, to be prepared in the camp and transported in waggons to the point where the bridges ball stood. On these frail barks the other bank was reached and as it was found unoccupied, the bridge was re-established with out much difficulty; the communications were thereupen quickly restored, and the eagerly expected supplies were conveyed to the camp. Caesar's happy idea thus rescued the army from the immense peril in which it was placed. Then the cample of Caesar which is according to the cample of the cavalry of Caesar, which in efficiency far surpassed that of the enemy, began at once to scour the country on the left back of the Sicoris; the most considerable Spanish communities of the Pyreness and the Ebro—Grea, Tarraco, Bertiesa, between the Pyreness and the Ebro—Grea, Tarraco, and others-nay, even several to the south of the Ebro, passed over to Caesar's side.

The supplies of the Pompeians were now rendered scarce through the foraging parties of Caesar and the defection of the neighbouring communities; they resolved at length to retire behind the line of the Ebro, and set themselves in all haste to form a bridge of boats over the Ebro below the mouth of the Sicoris. Caesar sought to cut off the retreat of his opponents over the Ebro and to detain them in Ilerda; but so long as the enemy remained in possession of the bridge at Ilerda and he had control of neither ford nor bridge there, he could not distribute his army over both banks of the river and could not invest Ilerda. His soldiers therefore worked day and night to lower the depth of the river by means of canals drawing off the water, so that the infantry could wade through it. But the preparations of the Pompeians to pass the Ebro were sooner finished than the arrangements of the Caesarians to invest Ilerda; when the former after finishing the bridge of boats began their march towards the Ebro along the left bank of the Sicoris, the canals of the Caesarians seemed to the general not yet far enough advanced to make the ford available for the infantry; he ordered only his cavalry to pass the stream and, by clinging to the rear of the enemy, at least to detain and harass them.

But when Caesar's legions saw in the grey morning the enemy's columns which had been retiring since midnight, they discerned with the sure instinct of experienced veterans the strategic importance of this retreat, which would compel them to follow their antagonists into distant and impracticable regions filled by hostile troops; at their own request the general ventured to lead the infantry also into the river, and although the water reached up to the shoulders of the men, it was crossed without accident. It was high time. If the narrow plain, which separated the town of Ilerda from the mountains enclosing the Ebro were once traversed and the army of the Pompeians entered the mountains, their retreat to the Ebro could no longer be prevented. Already they had, notwithstanding the constant attacks of the enemy's cavalry which greatly delayed their march, approached within five miles of the mountains, when they, having been on the march since midnight and unspeakably exhausted, abandoned their original plan of traversing the whole plain on the same day, and pitched their camp. Here the infantry of Caesar overtook them and encamped opposite to them in the evening and during the night, as the nocturnal march which the Pompeians had at first contemplated was ahandoned from fear of the night attacks of the cavalry. On the following day also both armies remained immovable, occupied only in reconnoutring the country

Early in the morning of the third day Caesar's infantry set out, that hy a movement through the pathless mountains alongside of the road they might turn the position of the enemy and bar their route to the Ebro The object of the strange march, which seemed at first to turn back towards the camp before Herda, was not at once perceived by the Pompeian officers When they discerned it, they sacrificed camp and baggage and advanced by a forced march along the highway to gain the crest of the ridge before the Caesarians But it was already too late, when they came up, the compact masses of the enemy were already posted on the highway itself. A desperate attempt of the Pompeians to discover other routes to the Ebro over the steep mountains was frustrated by the Roman and cut to pieces the Lusi Had a battle taken tanıan ich had the enems s place Lu cavalry in its rear and their infantry in iront, and was utterly demoralised-and the Caesarians, the issue was scarcely doubt ful, and the opportunity for fighting several times presented itself, but Caesar made no use of it, and restrained with diffi culty, the impatient eagerness for combat in his soldiers sure of The Pompeian army was at any rate strategically Jost, Caesar avoided weakening his army and still further envenoming the bitter feud by useless bloodshed. On the very - to on off the Pompeians from escort consisting of slaves and up a way tors and caused the Caccarana, on whom he could lay stakes, to be put to death Caccarana, on whom he could lay stakes who had come to his camp back unharmed, and persevered in seeking a peaceful solution. Herda where the foreign and still a garrison and considerable magazines became now the point which they sought to reach, but with the 1 substanting in front and the Sicons between them and the fortiers, they matched without coming nearer to their of ject. The r

cavalry became gradually so afraid that the infantry had to take them into the centre and legions had to be set as the rearguard; the procuring of water and forage became more and more difficult; they had already to kill the beasts of burden, because they could no longer feed them. At length the wandering army found itself formally inclosed, with the Sicoris in its rear and the enemy's force in front, which drew rampart and trench around it. It attempted to cross the river, but Caesar's German horsemen and light infantry anticipated it in the occupation of the opposite bank.

No bravery and no fidelity could longer avert the inevitable capitulation (2nd August  $^{70.5}_{4.5}$ ). Caesar granted to officers and soldiers their life and liberty, and the possession of the property which they still retained as well as the restoration of what had been already taken from them, the full value of which he undertook personally to make good to his soldiers; and not only so, but while he had compulsorily enrolled in his army the recruits captured in Italy, he honoured these old legionaries of Pompeius by the promise that no one should be compelled to enter the army against his will. He required only that each should give up his arms and repair to his home. Accordingly the soldiers who were natives of Spain, about a third of the army, were disbanded at once, while the Italian soldiers were discharged at the borders of Transalpine and Cisalpine Gaul.

Hither Spain on the breaking up of this army fell of itself into the power of the victor. In Further Spain, where Marcus Varro held the chief command for Pompeius, it seemed to him. when he learned the disaster of Ilerda, most advisable that he should throw himself into the insular town of Gades and should carry thither for safety the considerable sums which he had collected by confiscating the treasures of the temples and the property of prominent Caesarians, the not inconsiderable fleet which he had raised, and the two legions entrusted to him. But on the mere rumour of Caesar's arrival the most notable towns of the province which had been for long attached to Caesar declared for the latter and drove: away the Pompeian garrisons or induced them to a similar revolt; such was the case with Corduba, Carmo, and Gades itself... One of the legions also set out of its own accord for Hispalis, and passed over along with this town to Caesar's side. When at length even Italica closed its gates against Varro, the latter resolved to capitulate.

About the same time Massilia also submitted. With rare energy the Massiliots had not merely sustained a siege, but had also kept the sea against Caesar, it was their patite element, and they might hope to obtain vigorous support on it from Pompeius, who in fact had the exclusive command of it But Caesar's lieutenant, the able Decimus Brutus, the same who had achieved the first naval victory in the Atlantic over the Veneti (p 236), managed rapidly to equip a fleet, and in spite of the brave resistance of the enemy's crews-consisting partly of Albioecian mercenanes of the Massiliots, partly of slaveherdsmen of Domitius-he vanquished by means of his brave marines selected from the legions the stronger Massiliot fleet, and sank or captured the greater part of their ships. When a small Pompeian squadron under Lucius Nasuidis arrived from the l'ast hy way of Sicily and Sardinia in the port of Massilia, the Massiliots renewed their naval armament and suiled forth along with the ships of Nasidius against Brutus The engagement which took place off Tauroeis (La Ciotat to the east of Marseilles) might probably have had a different result, if the vessels of Nasidius had fought with the same desperate courage which the Massiliots displayed on that day, but the flight of the Nasidians decided the victory in favour of Brutus, and the remains of the Pompeian fleet fied to Spain The besieged were completely driven from the sea. On the landward side, where Gaius Trebonius conducted the siege, the most resolute resistance was still continued, but in spite of the frequent sallies of the Albioecian mercenaries and the skilful expenditure of the immense stores of projectiles accumulated in the city, the works of the besiegers were at length advanced up to the walls and one of the towers fell The Massihots declared that they would give up the defence, but desired to conclude the capitutation with Caesar himself, and entreated the Roman commander to suspend the siege operations till Caesar's arrival Trebenius had express orders from Caesar to spare the town as far as he armited the armistice desired. But when the - which they com works, the struggle of the exasperation The vigorous commander of the Romans repaired with surprising rapidity the destroyed towers and it'e mound, the Massiliots were now once more complainty enclosed to surrender on any terms. Domitius alone, remembering the indulgence of the victor which he had shamefully misused, embarked in a boat and stole through the Roman fleet, to seek a third battle-field for his implacable resentment. Caesar's soldiers had sworn to put to the sword the whole male population of the perfidious city, and vehemently demanded from the general the signal for plunder. But Caesar, mindful here also of his task of establishing Helleno-Italic civilisation in the West, was not to be coerced into furnishing a sequel to the destruction of Corinth. Massilia-the most remote from the mothercountry of all those cities, once so numerous, free, and powerful, that belonged to the old Ionic mariner-nation, and almost the last in which the Hellenic seafaring life had preserved itself fresh and pure, as in fact it was the last Greek city that fought at sea-Massilia had to surrender its magazines of arms and naval stores to the victor, and lost a portion of its territory and of its privileges; but it retained its freedom and its nationality and continued, though with diminished proportions in a material point of view, to be intellectually the centre of Hellenic culture in that distant Celtic country which at this very time was attaining a new historical significance.

When Caesar on his return from the conquest of Spain armed before their city, he found in reduced to extremited partly by the enemy's attacks, partly by famine and pretidence, and ready for the second time—on this occasion in rght carnest—

While thus in the western provinces the war after various critical vicissitudes was thoroughly decided at length in favour of Caesar, Spain and Massilia were subdued, and the chief army of the enemy was captured to the last man, the decision of arms had also taken place on the second arena of warfare, on which Caesar had found it necessary immediately after the conquest of Italy to assume the offensive.

We have already mentioned that the Pompeians intended to reduce Italy to starvation. They had the means of doing so in their hands. They had thorough command of the sea and laboured with great zeal everywhere-in Gades, Utica, Messana, above all in the East—to increase their fleet. They held moreover all the provinces from which the capital drew its means of subsistence: Sardinia and Corsica through Marcus Cotta, Sicily through Marcus Cato, Africa through the selfnominated commander-in-chief Titus Attius Varus and their ally Juba king of Numidia. It was indispensably needful for Caesar to thwart these plans of the enemy and to wrest from them the corn-provinces. Quintus Valerius was sent with a legion to Sardinia and compelled the Pompeian governor to evacuate the island. The more important enterprise of taking Sicily and Africa from the enemy was entrusted to the young Gaius

Curio with the assistance of the able Guus Cammus Rebilus, who had experience in war Sicily was occupied by him with C to without a proper army and not a man of the

والماساساها TISE

كتلالان يديد بال

d so

important for the capital, and embarked with a -two legions and 500 horse-for Africa Here he might expect to encounter more serious resistance, besides the considerable and in its own fashion efficient army of Juha the governor Varus had formed two legions of Romans settled in Africa and also fitted out a small squadron of ten sul With the aid of his superior fleet, however. Cuno effected without difficulty a landing between Hadrumetum, where the one legion of the enemy lay along with their ships of war, and Utica in front of which town lay the second legion under Varus himself. Curio turned against the latter, and pitched his camp not far from Utica, just where a century and a half before the elder Scipio had taken up lus first winter-encampment in Africa (ii 170). Caesar, compelled to keep together his best troops for the Spanish war, had been obliged to make up the Sicilo-African army for the most part out of the legions taken over from the enemy, more especially the war prisoners of Corf mom, the officers of the Pompeian army in Africa, some of whom had served in the very legions that were conquered at Corf nium 4 now left no means untried to bring back their old soldiers who were fighting against them to their first allegiance But Caesar had not erred in the choice of his heutenant | Curio Lnew as well how to direct the movements of the array and of the fleet as how to acquire personal influence over the soldiers, the supplies were abundant, the conflicts without exception successful

When Varus, presuming that the troops of Curio only wanted opportunity to pass over to his side, resolved to give hattle chiefly for the sake of affording them this opportunits, the result did not justify his expectations. Ammated by the fery appeal of their youthful leader, the cavalry of Cuno put to flight the horserien of the enemy, and in presence of the two armies cut down also the light infantry which he I accompanied the horsemen, and emboldered by this success and by fur s personal example, his legions advanced illrough the d'fixule ravine separating the two I nes to the attack for which the Pompeians however did not wait, but disgracefully fed tack to their camp and evacuated even this in the ensuing night. The victory was so complete that Curio at once took steps to besiege Utica. When news arrived, however, that king Juba was advancing with all his forces to its relief, Curio resolved, just as Scipio had done on the arrival of Syphax, to raise the siege and to return to Scipio's former camp till reinforcements should arrive from Sicily. Soon afterwards came a second report, that king Juba had been induced by the attacks of neighbouring chiefs to turn back with his main force and was sending to the aid of the besieged merely a moderate corps under Saburra. Curio, who from his lively temperament had only with great reluctance made up his mind to rest, now set out again at once to fight with Saburra before he could enter into communication with the garrison of Utica.

His cavalry, which had gone forward in the evening, actually succeeded in surprising the corps of Saburra on the Bagradas during the night and inflicting much damage upon it; and on the news of this victory Curio hastened the march of the infantry, in order by their means to complete the defeat. Soon they perceived on the last slopes of the heights that sank towards the Bagradas the corps of Saburra, which was skirmishing with the Roman horsemen; the legions coming up helped to drive it completely down into the plain. But here the combat changed its aspect. Saburra was not, as they supposed, destitute of support; on the contrary he was not much more than five miles distant from the Numidian main force. Already the flower of the Numidian infantry and 2000 Gallic and Spanish horsemen had arrived on the field of battle to support Saburra, and the king in person with the bulk of the army and sixteen elephants was approaching. After the nocturnal march and the hot conflict there were at the moment not more than 200 of the Roman cavalry together, and these as well as the infantry, extremely exhausted by fatigue and fighting, were all surrounded, in the wide plain into which they had allowed themselves to be allured, by the continually increasing hosts of the enemy. Vainly Curio endeavoured to engage in close combat; the Libyan horsemen retreated, as they were wont, so soon as a Roman division advanced, only to pursue it when it turned. In vain he attempted to regain the heights; they were occupied and foreclosed by the enemy's horse. All was lost. The infantry was cut down to the last man. Of the cavalry a few succeeded in cutting their way through; Curio too might have probably saved himself, but he could not bear to appear without the army entrusted to him in presence of his master, and died sword in hand. Even the force which was collected in the camp before Utica, and that which guarded the fleet—which might so easily have escaped to Sicily—surrendered under the impression made by the fearfully impid catastrophe on the following day to Varus (August or September 1983)

So ended the expedition arranged by Caesar to Sicily and Africa It attained its object so far, since by the occupation of Sicily in connection with that of Sardinia the most urgent wants of the capital were relieved, the miscarriage of the con quest of Africa-from which the victorious party drew no further substantial gain-and the loss of two untrustworths legions might be got over But the early death of Cuno was an irreparable loss for Caesar, and indeed for Rome of without reason had Caesar entrusted the most important in dependent command to this young man, although he had no military experience and was notorious for his dissolute life, there was a spark of Caesar s own spirit in the fiery vouth. He resembled Caesar, masmuch as he had drained the cup of pleasure to the dregs, masmuch as he did not become a states man because he was an officer, but it was his political action that placed the sword in his hands, masmuch as his eloquence was not that of rounded periods, but the eloquence of deeply felt thought, masmuch as his mode of warfare has based on rapid action with slight means, in smuch as his character was marked by levity and often by frivolity, by pleasant frankness and thorough life in the moment II, as his general says of him, youthful fire and high courage carried him into incautious acts, and if he too proudly accepted death that he might not submit to be pardoned for a pardonable fault, traits of similar im prudence and similar pride are not wanting in Caesar's history also. We may regret that this exuberant nature was not permitted to work off its follies and to preserve itself for the following generation so miserably poor in talents, and so rap dly falling a prey to the dreadful rule of mediocrities

How far these events of the war in 22 interfered with Pompeus' general plan for the campaign, and particularly what part in that plan was assigned after the loss of Italy to the important military corps in the West, can only be determined by conjecture. That Pompeus had the intention of coming by why of Africa and Vauretania to the aid of his array fighting in "pairy was a riph, a romantic, and beyond dust altogether groundless, number carried the da altogether groundless, number carried the da.

It is much more likely that he still kept by his earlier plan of attacking Caesar from both sides in Transalpine and Cisalpine Gaul (p. 350) even after the loss of Italy, and meditated a combined attack at once from Spain and Macedonia. It may be presumed that the Spanish army was meant to remain on the defensive at the Pyrenees till the Macedonian army in the course of organisation was likewise ready to march; whereupon both would then have started simultaneously and effected a junction according to circumstances either on the Rhine or on the Po, while the fleet, it may be conjectured, would have attempted at the same time to recover Italy proper. On this supposition apparently Caesar had first prepared himself to meet an attack on Italy. One of the ablest of his officers, the tribune of the people Marcus Antonius, commanded there with propraetorian powers. The south-eastern ports-Sipus, Brundisium, Tarentum-where an attempt at landing was first to be expected, had received a garrison of three legions. Besides this Quintus Hortensius, the degenerate son of the well-known orator. collected a fleet in the Tyrrhene Sea, and Publius Dolabella a second fleet in the Adriatic, which were to be employed partly to support the defence, partly to transport the intended expedition to Greece. In the event of Pompeius attempting to penetrate by land into Italy, Marcus Licinius Crassus, the eldest son of the old colleague of Caesar, was to conduct the defence of Cisalpine Gaul, Gaius the younger brother of Marcus Antonius that of Illyricum.

But the expected attack was long in coming. It was not till the height of summer that the conflict began in Illyria. There Caesar's lieutenant Gaius Antonius with his two legions lay in the island of Curicta (Veglia in the gulf of Quarnero), and Caesar's admiral Publius Dolabella with forty ships lay in the narrow arm of the sea between this island and the mainland. The admirals of Pompeius in the Adriatic, Marcus Octavius with the Greek, Lucius Scribonius Libo with the Illyrian division of the fleet, attacked the squadron of Dolaballa, destroyed all his ships, and cut off Antonius on his island. To rescue him, a corps under Basilus and Sallustius came from Italy and the squadron of Hortensius from the Tyrrhene Sea; but neither the former nor the latter were able to effect anything in presence of the far superior fleet of the enemy. The legions of Antonius had to be abandoned to their fate. Provisions came to an end. the troops became troublesome and mutinous; with the exception of a few divisions, which succeeded in reaching the

tions in state law as to whether and how a curiate law could be legitmately enacted elsewhere than at the Capitol

A far worse trait was the indifference of the lukewarm and the narrow-minded stubbornness of the ultras The former could neither be induced to act nor to keep silence. If they solved to evert themselves in some definite way for the

to compromise them sum lucuses, -

they were ordered at all or did it with half heart. At the same time of course, with their affectation of knowing better when it was too late and their over-use impracticabilities, they proved a perpetual clog to those who were acting; their daily nork consisted in criticising, indiculing, and bemoaning every occurrence great and small, and in unnersing and discouraging the multitude by their own sluggishness and hopelessness

While these displayed the utter prostration of weakness, the ultras on the other hand exhibited in full display its exaggerated With them there was no attempt to conceal that the preliminary to any negotiation for peace was the bringing over preummary to any negonation for prace was the bringing over of Caesar's head; every one of the attempts towards peace, which Caesar repeatedly made even now, was tossed adde without being examined, or employed only to cover invitions attempts on the lives of the commissioners of their opponent.

· or less neutral. Lucius Domitius, the hero of Corinium, grave, proposed in the council of war that those senators who had fought in the army of l'ompeint should come to a vote on all who had either remained neutral or had emigrated but not entered the army, and should accerding to their own pleasure individually acquit them er punch them by fine or even by the forfeiture of life and property. Another of these ultras formally lodged with Pompeus a charge of corruption and treason against Lucius Afranas for Lis defective defence of Spain Among these deep-died regullicant their political theory assumed almost the character of a confession of religious faith, they accordingly hated their own more lukewarm partisans and Pompeius with his personal adherents, if possible, still more than their eyeo opportunity equits of diffinction; but, when Hatarch makes the liver bombed Ha'un whitesale dealers (Cato Man 29 6s), he has rounders'eed in softer 49 feld 44 or 1 (Bei Afr 92)

and that with all the dull obstinacy of hatred which is wont to characterise orthodox theologians; and they were mainly to blame for the numberless and bitter separate quarrels which distracted the emigrant army and emigrant senate. But they did not confine themselves to words. Marcus Bibulus, Titus Labienus, and others of this clique carried out their theory in practice, and caused such officers or soldiers of Caesar's army as fell into their hands to be executed en masse; which, as may well be conceived, did not tend to make Caesar's troops fight with less energy. If the counter-revolution in favour of the friends of the constitution, for which all the elements were in existence (p. 357), did not break out in Italy during Caesar's absence, the reason, according to the assurance of discerning opponents of Caesar, lay chiefly in the general dread of the unbridled fury of the republican ultras after the restoration should have taken place. The better men in the Pompeian camp were in despair at this frantic behaviour. Pompeius, himself a brave soldier, spared the prisoners as far as he might and could; but he was too pusillanimous and in too awkward a position to prevent or even to punish all atrocities of this sort, as it became the commander-in-chief to do. Marcus Cato, the only man who at least carried moral consistency into the struggle, attempted with more energy to check such proceedings; he induced the emigrant senate to prohibit by a special decree the pillage of subject towns and the putting to death of a burgess otherwise than in battle. The able Marcus Marcellus had similar views. No one, indeed, knew better than Cato and Marcellus that the extreme party would carry out their valiant acts, if necessary, in defiance of all decrees of the senate. if even now, when they had still to regard considerations of prudence, the rage of the ultras could not be tamed, people might prepare themselves after the victory for a reign of terror from which Marius and Sulla themselves would have turned away with horror; and we can understand why Cato, according to his own confession, was more afraid of the victory than of the defeat of his own party.

The management of the military preparations in the Macedonian camp was in the hands of Pompeius the commander-in-chief. His position, always troublesome and galling, had become still worse through the unfortunate events of  $\frac{705}{49}$ . In the eyes of his partisans he was mainly to blame for this result. This judgment was in various respects not just. A considerable part of the misfortunes endured was to be laid to the account contingents of the subjects and chents of Rome The flower of it consisted of the Celts, partly from the garrison of Alexandna (p. 145), partly the contingents of king Deutarus who in spite of his great age had appeared in person at the head of his troops, and of the other Galatian dynasts. With them were associated the excellent Thracian horsemen, who were partly brought up by their princes Sadala and Rhaskypons, partly enlisted by Pompeius in the Macedonian proxince, the Cappa docian cavalry, the mounted archers sent by Antiochus king of Commagene, the contingents of the Armenians from the west side of the Euphrates under Taxiles, and from the other side under Vegabates, and the Numidian bands sent by king Juba—the whole body amounted to 7000 horsemen

Lastly the fleet of Pompeius was very considerable. It was formed partly of the Roman transports brought from Brun distum or subsequently built, partly of the war vessels of the king of Egypt, of the Colchian princes, of the Cilician dynast Tarcondimotus, of the cities of Tyre, Rhodes, Athens, Corcyra and generally of all the Asiatic and Greek mantime states, and it numbered nearly 500 sail, of which the Roman vessels formed a fifth Immense magazines of corn and military stores were accumulated in Dyrrhachium. The war-chest was well filled, for the Pompeians were in possession of the principal sources of the public revenue and turned to their own account the moneyed resources of the chent princes, of the senators of distinction, of the farmers of the taxes, and generally of the whole Roman and non Roman population within their reach. Every appliance that the reputation of the legitimate govern ment and the much renowned protectorship of Pompeius over kings and peoples could move in Africa Fgypt, Macedonia, Greece, Western Asia and Syria had been put in motion for the protection of the Roman republie, the report which circulated in Italy that Pompeius was arming the Getae, Co'chians and Armenians against Rome, and the designation of "kings' kings" given to Pompeius in the camp, could hardly be called ex aggerations. On the whole he had command over an army of 7000 cavalry and eleven legions, of which, it is true, but five at the most could be described as accustomed to war, and over a fleet of 500 sail The temper of the soldiers, i where pros isioning and pay Pompeius manifested adequate care, and to whom in the event of victory the most abundant rewards were promised, was throughout good, in several-and these precisely the most efficient-disisions excellent, but a great part e' s'- army consisted of newly-raised troops, the formation and training of which, however zealously it was prosecuted, necessarily required time. The force altogether was imposing, but at the same time of a somewhat motley character.

According to the design of the commander-in-chief the army and fleet were to be in the main completely united by the winter of  $\frac{7.05}{4.9} = \frac{70.6}{4.8}$  along the coast and in the waters of Epirus. The admiral Bibulus had already arrived with 110 ships at his new head-quarters, Corcyra. On the other hand the land army, the head-quarters of which had been during the summer at Berrhoea on the Haliacmon, had not yet come up; the mass of it was moving slowly along the great highway from Thessalonica towards the west coast to the future head-quarters Dyrrhachium; the two legions, which Metellus Scipio was bringing up from Syria, remained at Pergamus in Asia for winter quarters and were expected in Europe only towards spring. They were taking time in fact for their movements. For the moment the ports of Epirus were guarded, over and above the fleet, merely by their own civic defences and the levies of the adjoining districts.

It thus remained possible for Caesar, notwithstanding the intervention of the Spanish war, to assume the offensive also in Macedonia; and he at least was not slow to act. He had long ago ordered the collection of vessels of war and transports in Brundisium, and after the capitulation of the Spanish army and the fall of Massilia had directed the greater portion of the select troops employed there to proceed to that destination. The unparalleled exertions no doubt, which were thus required by Caesar from his soldiers, thinned the ranks more than their conflicts had done, and the mutiny of one of the four oldest legions, the ninth, on its march through Placentia was a dangerous indication of the temper prevailing in the army; but Caesar's presence of mind and personal authority mastered it, and from this quarter nothing impeded the embarkation. But the want of ships, through which the pursuit of Pompeius had failed in March 705, threatened also to frustrate this expedition. The war-vessels, which Caesar had given orders to build in the Gallic, Sicilian, and Italian ports, were not yet ready or at any rate not on the spot; his squadron in the Adriatic had been in the previous year destroyed at Curicta (p. 371); he found at Brundisium not more than twelve ships of war and scarcely transports enough to convey over at once the third part of his army—of twelve legions and 10,000 cavalry—

destined for Greece The considerable fleet of the enemy exclusively commanded the Adriatic and especially all the harbours of the mainland and islands on its eastern coast Under such circumstances the question presents itself, why Caesar did not instead of the maritime route choose the land route through Illy na, which relieved him from all the perils threatened by the fleet and besides was shorter for his troops, who mostly came from Gaul, than the route by Brundisium It is true that the Illy tian country was rugged and poor beyond description, but it was traversed by other armies not long after wards, and this obstacle can hardly have appeared insurmount able to the conqueror of Gaul Perhaps he apprehended that during the troublesome march through Illi ria Pompeius riight convey his whole force over the Adriatic, whereby their parts would at once have been changed and Caesar must have taken up his position in Macedonia, while Pompeius las in Itale, although such a rapid change was scarcely to be expected from his slow moving antagonist Perhaps Caesar had decided for the maritime route on the supposition that his fleet would mean while be brought into a condition to command respect, and when after his return from Spain he became aware of the trustate of things in the Adriatic, it might be too late to change the plan of campaign Perhaps-and, in accordance with Caesar's quick temperament always urging him to decision we may even say in all probability-he found himself irresistibly tempted by the circumstance that the Epirote coast was still at the moment unoccupied but would certainly be covered in a few days by the enemy to thwart once more by a bold streke the whole plan of his antagonist

However this may be, on the 4th January 100 Caestra set sail with six legions greatly thurned by toil and sixkress and 600 horsemen from Brundistum for the coast of I prims. It was a counterpart to the foolhardy Britannic expedition, but at feast the fir I throw was fortunate. The coast was treiched in the firequented roadstead of Paleassa (Palyassa). The transpars were seen both from the harbour of Oracum feech of Moral where a Pompeian squadron of eighteen sail was form and from the head-quarteers of the hostile flect at Cores ra, but in the counter they deemed themselves too weak, in the other throw not ready to sail so that the first fire phr was landed with bundrance. While the vessels at once returned to from our Macroding to the resided caesals a warm of the phase of the passes.

the second, Caesar on that same evening ascended the Acroceraunian mountains. His first successes were as great as the surprise of his enemies. The Epirote militia nowhere resisted; the important seaport towns of Oricum and Apollonia along with a number of smaller places were taken, and Dyrrhachium, selected by the Pompeians as their chief arsenal and filled with stores of all sorts, but only feebly garrisoned, was in the utmost

But the further course of the campaign did not correspond to this brilliant beginning. Bibulus subsequently made up in some measure for the negligence, of which he had been guilty, by redoubling his exertions. He not only captured nearly thirty of the transports returning home, and caused them with every living thing on board to be burnt, but he also established along the whole district of coast occupied by Caesar, from the island Sason (Saseno) as far as the ports of Corcyra, a most careful watch, however troublesome it was rendered by the inclement season of the year and the necessity of bringing everything necessary for the guard-ships, even wood and water, from Corcyra; in fact his successor Libo-for he himself soon succumbed to the unwonted fatigues-even blockaded for a time the port of Brundisium, till the want of water again dislodged him from the little island in front of it on which he had established himself. It was not possible for Caesar's officers to convey the second portion of the army over to their general. As little did he himself succeed in the capture of Dyrrhachium. Pompeius learned through one of Caesar's peace-envoys as to his preparations for the voyage to the Epirote coast, and, thereupon accelerating his march, threw himself just at the right time into that important arsenal. The situation of Caesar was critical. Although he extended his range in Epirus as far as with his slight strength was at all possible, the subsistence of his army remained difficult and precarious, while the enemy, in possession of the magazines of Dyrrhachium and masters of the sea, had abundance of everything. With his army probably little above 20,000 strong he could not offer battle to that of Pompeius at least twice as numerous, but had to deem himself fortunate that Pompeius went methodically to work and, instead of immediately forcing a battle, took up his winter quarters between Dyrrhachium and Apollonia on the right bank of the Apsus, facing Caesar on the left, in order that after the arrival of the legions from Pergamus in the spring he might annihilate the enemy with an irresistibly superior force. Thus months passed If the arrival of the better serson, which brought to the enemy a strong additional force and the free us of his fleet, found Caesar still in the same position, he was it all appearance lost, with his weak band wedged in among the rocks of Epirus between the immense fleet and the three time superior land army of the enemy, and already the winter was drawing to a close. His sole hope still depended on the transport fleet, any attempt to steal or fight its way through the blockade was more than audicious, but after the first voluntary foolhardiness this second venture was enjoined by necessity. How desperate his situation appeared to Caesar himself is

But his appearance in bear faithful officer who commanded in Italy, Marcus Automus, to make this last effort for the saving of his master. Once more the transport fleet, with four legions and 800 cavalry on board, sailed from the harbour of Brundsium, and fortunately a strong south wind carried it past Libo's galleys But the same wind, which thus saved the fleet, rendered it impossible for it to land as it was directed on the coast of Apollonia, and compelled it to sail past the camps of Caesar and Pompeias and to steer to the north of Dyrrhachium towards Lusus, which town fortunately still adhered to Caesar (p 372) When it sailed past the harbour of Dyrthachium, the Rhodian galleys started in pursuit, and hardly had the ships of Antonius entered the port of Lissus when the enemy s squadron appeared before it But just at this moment the wind suddenly veered, and drove the pursuing galleys hack into the open sea and partly on the rocky coast Through the most marvellous good forture the landing of the second freight had also been successful.

Antonius and Caesar were no doubt still some four dais' march from each other, separated by Dyrhathium and the whole army of the enems, but Antonius happily effected the penious march round about Dyrhachium through the passes of the Grabs Balkan, and was received by Caesar, who had gone to meet him, on the right bank of the April. Forty is, after having vanily attempted to prevent the partin of the two armies of the energy and to force the corps of Antonius to fight by itself, took up a new position at April or of the right of the April of the April of the Caesar Caesar between the latter and the town of Dyrrhachium, and here remained once more immovable. Caesar felt himself now strong enough to give battle; but Pompeius declined it. On the other hand he succeeded in deceiving Pompeius and throwing himself unawares with his better marching troops, just as at Ilerda, between the enemy's camp and the fortress of Dyrrhachium on which it rested as a basis. The chain of the Graba Balkan, which stretching in a direction from east to west ends on the Adriatic in the narrow tongue of land at Dyrrhachium, sends off-fourteen miles to the east of Dyrrhachium-in a south-westerly direction a lateral branch which likewise turns in a crescentic form towards the sea, and the main chain and lateral branch of the mountains enclose between themselves a small plain extending round a cliff on the seashore. Pompeius now took up his camp, and, although Caesar's army kept the land route to Dyrrhachium closed against him, he yet with the aid of his fleet remained constantly in communication with the town and was amply and easily provided from it with everything needful; while among the Caesarians, notwithstanding strong detachments to the country lying behind, and notwithstanding all the exertions of the general to bring about an organised system of conveyance and thereby a regular supply, there was more than scarcity, and flesh, barley, nay even roots, had very frequently to take the place of the wheat to which they were accustomed.

CHAP. X. Brundisium, Ilerda, Pharsalus

As his phlegmatic opponent persevered in his inaction, Caesar undertook to occupy the circle of heights which enclosed the plain on the shore held by Pompeius, with the view of being able at least to arrest the movements of the superior cavalry of the enemy and to operate with more freedom against Dyrrhachium, and if possible to compel his opponent either to battle or to embarkation. Nearly the half of Caesar's troops was detached to the interior; it seemed almost Quixotic to propose with the rest virtually to besiege an army perhaps twice as strong, concentrated in position, and resting on the sea and the fleet. Yet Caesar's veterans by infinite exertions invested the Pompeian camp with a chain of posts sixteen miles long, and afterwards added, just as before Alesia, to this inner line a second outer one, to protect themselves against attacks from Dyrrhachium and against attempts to turn their position which could so easily be executed with the aid of the fleet. Pompeius attacked more than once portions of these entrenchments with a view to break if possible the enemy's line, but he did not attempt to prevent the investment by a battle, he preferred to construct in his turn a number of entrenchments around his camp, and to connect them with one another by lines. Both sides exerted themselves to push forward their trenches as far as possible, and the earthworks advanced but slowly amidst constant conflicts At the same time skirmishing went on on the opposite side of Caesar's camp with the garrison of Dyrrhachium, Caesar boped to get the fortress into his power by means of an understanding with some of its inmates, but was prevented by the enemy's fleet. There was incessant fighting at very different points-on one of the hottest days at six places simultaneously-and, as a rule, the tried valour of the Caesarians had the advantage in these skirmishes, once, for instance, a single cohort maintained itself in its entrenchments against four legions for several hours, till support came up No prominent success was attained on either side, yet the effects of the investment came by degrees to be oppressively felt by the Pompetans The stopping of the rivulets flowing from the heights into the plain compelled them to be content with scanty and bad well water Still more severely felt was the want of fodder for the beasts of burden and the horses, which the fleet was unable adequately to remedy, numbers of them died, and it was of but little avail that the horses were conveyed by the fleet to Dyrrhachium, because there also they did not find suffi-

Pompeius could not much fonger delay to free himself from his disagreeable position by a blow struck against the enemy He was informed by Celtic deserters that the enemy had neglected to secure the beach between his two chains of en trenchments 600 feet distant from each other by a cross wall, and on this he formed his plan. While he caused the inner line of Caesar's entrenchments to be attacked by the legions from the camp, and the outer fine by the light troops placed in vessels and landed beyond the enemy's entrenchments, a third division landed in the space feft between the two lines and attacked in the rear their already sufficiently occupied defenders. The entrenchment next to the sea was taken, and the garrison fled in wild confusion, with difficulty the corrmander of the next trench Marcus Antonius succeeded in maintaining it and in setting a limit for the moment to the advance of the Pompeians, but, apart from the considerable loss, the outermost entrenchment along the sea remained in the hands of the Pompeians and the line was broken Caesar the more eagerly seized the opportunity, which soon after presented itself, of attacking a Pompeian legion, which had incautiously become isolated, with the bulk of his infantry. But the attacked made valiant resistance, and, as the ground on which the fight took place had been several times employed for the encampment of larger and lesser divisions and was intersected in various directions by mounds and ditches, Caesar's right wing along with the cavalry missed entirely its way; instead of supporting the left in attacking the Pompeian legion, it got into a narrow trench that led from one of the old camps towards the river. Thus Pompeius, who came up in all haste with five legions to the aid of his troops, found the two wings of the enemy separated, and one of them in an utterly forlorn position. When the Caesarians saw his advance, a panic seized them; the whole plunged into disorderly flight; and, if the matter ended with the loss of 1000 of the best soldiers and Caesar's army did not sustain a complete defeat, this was owing simply to the circumstance that Pompeius also could not freely deploy his force on the broken ground, and to the fact that, fearing a stratagem, he

at first held back his troops.

CHAP. X.

But, even as it was, these days were fraught with mischief. Not only had Caesar endured the most serious losses and forfeited at a blow his entrenchments, the result of four months of gigantic labour; he was by the recent engagements thrown back again exactly to the point from which he had set out. From the sea he was more completely driven than ever, since Pompeius' elder son Gnaeus had by a bold attack partly burnt, partly carried off, Caesar's few ships of war lying in the port of Oricum, and had soon afterwards also set fire to the transport fleet that was left behind in Lissus; all possibility of bringing up fresh reinforcements to Caesar by sea from Brundisium was thus lost. The numerous Pompeian cavalry, now released from their confinement, poured themselves over the adjacent country and threatened to render the provisioning of Caesar's army, which had always been difficult, utterly impossible. Caesar's daring enterprise of carrying on offensive operations without ships against an enemy in command of the sea and resting on his fleet had totally failed. On what had hitherto been the theatre of war he found himself in presence of an impregnable defensive position, and unable to strike a serious blow either against Dyrrhachium or against the hostile army; on the other hand it depended now solely on Pompeius whether he should proceed to attack under the most favourable circumstances an antagonist already in grave danger as to the means of subsistence The war had arrived at a crisis Hitherto Pompeius had, to all appearance, played the game of war without special plan, and only adjusted his defence according the expreneries of each attack, and this was not to be censured.

of bringing more fully into pidy in coup.

The defeate of Dyrrhachsum had not, it is true, that matters to come to an immed and to army by hunger and mutiny, but Caesar was entirely beaten not merely in tactics but also in strategy, and it seemed as if he could neither maintain himself in his present position nor judiciously change it

Pompeius had conquered, it was for him to assume the argressive, and he was resolved to do so Three different ways of rendering his victory fruitful presented themselves to him The first and simplest was not to desist from assailing the vanquished army, and, if it departed, to pursue it Secondly, Pompeius might leave Caesar himself and his best troops in Greece, and might cross in person, as he had long been ranking preparations for doing, with the main army to Italy, where the feeling was decidedly antimonarchical and the forces of Caesar, after the despatch of the best troops and their brave and trust-I worthy commandant to the Greek army, would not be of very much moment Lastly, the victor might turn inlund, effect a junction with the legions of Metellus Scipio, and attempt to capture the troops of Caesar stationed in the interior at after the arrival of the second detachments to Aetolia and stence for his army, and had ordered a corps of two regions a cor Gnacus Domitius Calvinus to advance on the Egnatian highway towards Macedonia, with the view of intercepting and if possible defeating in detail the corps of Scipio advancing on the same road from Thesialorica Calvinus and Scipio had alreads approached within a few miles of each other, when Scipio suddenly turned southward and, uus, penetratel into force Caesar a lerrice f the country under of recruits employed in . 5 ."

Lucius Cassius Longinus. But Longinus retired over the mountains towards Ambracia on the detachment under Gnaeus Calvisius Sabinus sent by Caesar to Aetolia, and Scipio could only cause him to be pursued by his Thracian cavalry, for Calvinus threatened his reserve left behind under Favonius on the Haliacmon with the same fate which he had himself destined for Longinus. So Calvinus and Scipio met again on the Haliacmon, and encamped there for a considerable time opposite to each other.

Pompeius might choose among these plans; no choice was left to Caesar. After that unfortunate engagement he entered on his retreat to Apollonia. Pompeius followed. The march from Dyrrhachium to Apollonia along a difficult road crossed by several rivers was no easy task for a defeated army pursued by the enemy; but the dexterous guidance of their general and the indestructible marching energy of the soldiers compelled Pompeius after four days' pursuit to suspend it as useless. He had now to decide between the Italian expedition and the march into the interior. However advisable and attractive the former might seem, and though various voices were raised in its favour, he preferred not to abandon the corps of Scipio, the more especially as he hoped by this march to get the corps of Calvinus into his hands. Calvinus lay at the moment on the Egnatian road at Heraclea Lyncestis between Pompeius and Scipio, and, after Caesar had retreated to Apollonia, farther distant from the latter than from the great army of Pompeius; without knowledge, moreover, of the events at Dyrrhachium and of his hazardous position, since after the successes achieved at Dyrrhachium the whole country inclined to Pompeius and the messengers of Caesar were everywhere seized. It was not till the enemy's main force had approached within a few miles of him that Calvinus learned from the accounts of the enemy's advanced posts themselves the state of things. A quick departure in a southerly direction towards Thessaly withdrew him at the last moment from imminent destruction; Pompeius had to content himself with having liberated Scipio from his position of peril. Caesar had meanwhile arrived unmolested at Apollonia. Immediately after the disaster of Dyrrhachium he had resolved if possible to transfer the struggle from the coast away into the interior, with the view of getting beyond the reach of the enemy's fleet—the ultimate cause of the failure of his previous exertions. The march to Apollonia had only been intended to place his wounded in safety and to pay his soldiers there, where his depôts were stationed, as soon as this was done, he set out for Thessaly, leaving behind garrisons in Apollonia, Oricum, and Lissus The corps of Calvinus had also put itself in motion towards Thessaly, and Caesar could effect a junction with the reinforcements coming up from Italy, this time by the land route through Illyria-two legions under Quintus Cornificius -still more easily in Thessaly than in Epirus Ascending by difficult paths in the valley of the Aoos and crossing the mountain chain which separates Epirus from Thessaly, he arrived at the Peneius, Calvinus was likewise directed thither, and the junction of the two armies was thus accomplished by the shortest route and that which was least exposed to the enemy place at Aeginium not far from the source of the Peneius first Thessalian town before which the now united army appeared, Gomphi, closed its gates against it, it was quickly stormed and given up to pillage and the other towns of Thessaly terrified by this example submitted, so soon as Caesar's legions merely appeared before the walls Amidst these marches and conflicts, and with the help of the supplies-albeit not too ample-which the region on the Peneius afforded, the traces and recollections of the calamitous days which they had passed through gradually vanished

The victories of Dyrrhachium had thus borne not much in mediate fruit for the victors Pompeius with his unwields army and his numerous cavalry had not been able to follow his versatile enemy into the mountains, Caesar like Calvinus had escaped from pursuit, and the two stood united and in full security in Thessaly Perhaps it would have been the best course if Pompeius had now without delay embarked with his main force fc * *** here success was scarcely doubtful - +4 for Sicily in the meant h Lacsar and Italy was looked on as so completely decided to . hachium that it only remained to reap the fruits of victory, in other words, to follow out and capture the defeated army Their former over-cautioos reserve was succeeded by an arrogance still less justified by circumstances, they gave to leed to the facts, that they had, strictly speaking, failed in the pursuit, that they had to hold themselves in readiness to encounter a completely refreshed and reorganised arms in Thesealy, and that there was no small risk in moving a var from the sea, renouncing the support of the firet, and followers the c antagonust to the battle-un'd chosen to himse's They were simply resolved at any price to fight with Caesar, and therefore to get at him as soon as possible and by the most convenient way. Cato took up the command in Dyrrhachium, where a garrison was left behind of eighteen cohorts, and in Corcyra, where 300 ships of war were left; Pompeius and Scipio proceeded—the former, apparently, following the Egnatian way as far as Pella and then striking into the great road to the south, the latter from the Haliacmon through the passes of Olympusto the lower Peneius and met at Larissa.

Caesar lay to the south of Larissa in the plain—which extends between the hill-country of Cynoscephalae and the chain of Othrys and is intersected by a tributary of the Peneius, the Enipeus—on the left bank of the latter stream near the town of Pharsalus; Pompeius pitched his camp opposite to him on the right bank of the Enipeus along the slope of the heights of Cynoscephalae. The entire army of Pompeius was assembled;

The exact determination of the field of battle is difficult. Appian, (ii. 75) expressly places it between (New) Pharsalus (now Fersala) and the Enipeus. Of the two streams, which alone are of any importance in the question and are undoubtedly the Apidanus and Enipeus of the ancients -the Sofadhitiko and the Fersaliti-the former has its sources in the mountains of Thaumaei (Dhomoko) and the Dolopian heights, the latter in mount Othrys, and the Fersaliti alone flows past Pharsalus; now as the Enipeus according to Strabo (ix. p. 432) springs from mount Othrys and flows past Pharsalus, the Fersaliti has been most justly pronounced by Leake (Northern Greece, iv. 320) to be the Enipeus, and the hypothesis followed by Göler that the Fersaliti is the Apidanus is untenable. With this all the other statements of the ancients as to the two rivers agree. Only we must doubtless assume with Leake, that the river of Vlokho formed by the union of the Fersaliti and the Sofadhitiko and going to the Peneius was ealled by the ancients Apidanus as well as the Sofadhitiko; which, however, is the more natural, as while the Sofadhitiko probably has, the Fersaliti has not, constantly water (Leake, iv. 321). Old Pharsalus. from which the battle takes its name, must therefore have been situated between Fersala and the Fersaliti. Accordingly the battle was fought on the left bank of the Fersaliti, and in such a way that the Pompeians, standing with their faces towards Pharsalus, leaned their right wing on the river (Caesar, B. C. iii. 83; Frontinus, Strat. ii. 3, 22). The camp of the Pompeians, however, cannot have stood here, but only on the slope of the heights of Cynoscephalae, on the right bank of the Enipeus, partly because they barred the route of Caesar to Seotussa, partly because their line of the carred avidently went over the mountains above the carry towards. retreat evidently went over the mountains above the camp towards Larissa; if they had, according to Leake's hypothesis (iv. 482), encamped to the east of Pharsalus on the left bank of the Enipeus, they could never have got to the northward through this stream, which at this very point has a deeply cut bed (Leake, iv. 469), and Pompeius must have fled to Lamia instead of Larissa. Probably therefore the Pompeians pitched their camp on the right bank of the Fersaliti, and passed the river both in order to fight and in order, after the battle, to regain their camp, whence they then moved up the slopes of Crannon and Scotussa, which culminate above the latter place in the heights of Cynoseephalae. This was not impossible. The Enipeus is a small slow-flowing rivulet, which Leake found two feet deep in November, and which in the hot season often lies quite dry Caesar on the other hand still expected the corps of nearly tw legions formerly detached to Aetolia and Thessaly, now statione under Ountus Fufius Calenus in Greece, and the two legions Cornificius which were sent after him by the land route from Italy and had already arrived in Illyria. The army of Pompeni numbering eleven legions or 47,000 men and 7000 horse, wa more than double that of Caesar in infantry, and seven times a numerous in cavalry, fatigue and conflicts had so decimate Caesar's troops, that his eight legions did not number more tha 22,000 men under arms, consequently not nearly the half of their normal amount. The victorious army of Pompeius pro vided with a countless cavalry and good magazines had pro visions in abundance, while the troops of Caesar had difficult in keeping themselves alive and only hoped for better supplie from the corn harvest not far distant. The Pompeian soldiers who had learned in the last campaign to know war and trus their leader, were in the best of humour All military reasons or the side of Pompeius favoured the view, that the decisive battle should not be long delayed, seeing that they now confronted Caesar in Thessaly, and the emigrant impatience of the many noble officers and others accompanying the army doubtless had more weight than even such reasons in the council of war Since the events of Dyrrhachium these lords regarded the triumph of their party as an ascertained fact; already there was eager strife as to the filling up of Caesar's supreme pontificate and instructions were sent to Rome to hire houses at the Forum for the next elections. When Pompeius hesitated as to his crossing of the rivulet which separated the two armies, and which Caesar with his much weaker army did not venture to pass, this excited great indignation, Pompeius, it was alleged, delayed the battle only in order to rule somewhat longer over so many consulars and praetorians and to perpetuate his part of Agamemnon. Pompeius yielded; and Caesar, who under the impression that matters would not come to a battle, had just projected a mode of turning the enemy's army and for that purpose was on the point of setting out towards Scotussa, likewise arrayed his legions for battle, when he saw the Pompeians preparing to offer it to him on his bank.

Thus the battle of Pharsalus was fought on the 9th August  $\frac{706}{48}$ , almost on the same field where a hundred and fifty years before the Romans had laid the foundation of their dominion in the East (ii. 282). Pompeius rested his right wing on the Enipeus; Caesar opposite to him rested his left on the broken ground stretching in front of the Enipeus; the two other wings were stationed out in the plain, covered in each case by the cavalry and the light troops. The intention of Pompeius was to keep his infantry on the defensive, but with his cavalry to scatter the weak band of horsemen which, mixed after the German fashion with light infantry, confronted him, and then to take Caesar's right wing in rear. His infantry courageously sustained the first charge of that of the enemy, and the engagement there came to a stand. Labienus likewise dispersed the enemy's cavalry after a brave but short resistance, and deployed his force to the left with the view of turning the infantry. But Caesar, foreseeing the defeat of his cavalry, had stationed behind it on the threatened flank of his right wing some 2000 of his best legionaries. As the enemy's horsemen, driving those of Caesar before them, galloped along and around the line, they suddenly came upon this select corps advancing intrepidly against them and, rapidly thrown into confusion by the unexpected and unusual infantry attack, they galloped at full speed from the field of battle. The victorious legionaries cut to pieces the enemy's archers now unprotected, then rushed at

With this is connected the well-known direction of Caesar to his soldiers to strike at the faces of the enemy's horsemen. The infantry—which here in an altogether irregular way acted on the offensive against cavalry, who were not to be reached with the sabres—were not to throw their pila, but to use them as hand-spears against the cavalry and, in order to defend themselves better against these, to thrust at their faces (Plutarch, Pomp. 69, 71; Caes. 45; Appian. ii. 76, 78; Flor. ii. 12; Oros. vii. 15; erroneously Frontinus, iv. 7, 32). The anecdotical turn given to this instruction, that the Pompeian horsemen were to be brought to run away by the fear of receiving scars in their faces, and that they actually galloped off "holding their hands before their eyes" (Phutarch), collapses of itself; for it has point only on the supposition that the Pompeian cavalry had consisted principally of the young nobility of Rome, the "graceful dancers;" and this was not the case (p. 377). At the most it may be, that the wit of the camp gave to that simple and judicious military order this very irrational but certainly comic turn.

the left wing of the enemy, and began now on their part to furn it. At the same time Caesar's third division hitherto reserved advanced along the whole line to the attack. The unexpected defeat of the best arm of the Pompeian army, as it raised the courage of their opponents, broke that of the arms and above all that of the general. When Pompeius, who from the outset did not trust his infantry, say the horsemen gallop off, he rode back at once from the field of battle to the camp, without ever awaiting the issue of the general attack ordered by Caesar His legions began to waver and soon to retire over the brook into the camp, which was not accomplished without severe loss.

The day was thus lost and many an able soldier had faller, but the army was stilf substantially intact, and the situation of Pompeuss was far less persions than that of Cassar after the defeat of Dyrrhachium But while Caesar in the vicissitudes of his destiny had learned that fortune hours to withdraw herself at certain moments even from her favourites in order to be once energies, the feebler soul on to ... sank into the infinite abyss of despondency. As once in the war with Sertorius he had been on the point of abandoning the office entrusted to him in presence of his superior opponent and of departing (p 30), so now, when he saw the legions retire over the stream, he threw from him the fatal general's scurf, and rode off by the nearest route to the sea, to find means of embarking there His army discouraged and feaderless-for Scipio, although recognised by Pompeius as colleague in supreme command, was yet general m-chief only in name-hoped to find protection behind the camp-walls, but Caesar allowed it no rest, the obstinate resistance of the Roman and Thracian puard of the camp was speedily overcome and the mass was compelled to withdraw in disorder to the heights of Crannon and Scottista, at the foot of which the camp was pitched. It attempted by moving forward along these bills to regain Larisa, but the troops of Caesar, heeding neither booty nor fatigue and advancing by better paths in the plain, intercepted the route of the fugitives, in fact, when late in the evening the Pompeians suspended the march, their pursuers were able even to draw an entrenct ed line which precluded the fugutives from access to the caly mu! ? to be found in the reighbourhood

L .La + merses erance, Pompetus knew

So ended the day of Pharsalus. The enemy's army was not only defeated, but annihilated; 15,000 of the enemy lay dead or wounded on the field of battle, while the Caesarians missed only 200 men; the body which remained together, amounting still to nearly 20,000 men, laid down their arms on the morning after the battle; only isolated troops, including, it is true, the officers of most note, sought a refuge in the mountains; of the eleven eagles of the enemy nine were handed over to Caesar. Caesar, who on the very day of the battle had reminded the soldiers that they should not forget the fellow-citizen in the foe, did not treat the captives as Bibulus and Labienus had done; nevertheless he too found it necessary now to exercise some severity. The common soldiers were incorporated in the army, fines or confiscations of property were inflicted on the men of better rank; the senators and equites of note who were taken, with few exceptions, suffered death. The time for clemency was past; the longer the civil war lasted, the more remorseless and implacable it became.

Some time elapsed before the consequences of the 9th of August  $\frac{706}{\pm 8}$  could be fully discerned. What admitted of least doubt, was the passing over to the side of Caesar of all those who had attached themselves to the party vanquished at Pharsalus merely as being the more powerful; the defeat was so thoroughly decisive, that the victor was joined by all who were not willing or were not obliged to fight for a lost cause. All the kings, peoples, and cities, which had hitherto been the clients of Pompeius, now recalled their naval and military contingents and declined to receive the refugees of the beaten party; such as Egypt, Cyrene, the communities of Syria, Phoenicia, Cilicia and Asia Minor, Rhodes, Athens, and generally the whole of the East. In fact Pharmaces king of the Bosporus pushed his officiousness so far, that on the news of the Pharsalian battle he took possession not only of the town of Phanagoria which several years before had been declared free by Pompeius, and of the dominions of the Colchian princes confirmed by him, but even of the kingdom of Little Armenia which Pompeius had conferred on king Deiotarus. Almost the sole exceptions to this general submission were the little town of Megara which allowed itself to be besieged and stormed by the Caesarians, and Juba king of Numidia, who had for long expected, and after the victory over Curio expected only with all the greater certainty, that his kingdom would be annexed by Caesar, and was thus obliged for better or for worse to abide by the defeated party.

In the same way as the client communities submitted to the victor of Pharsalus, the tail of the constitutional party-all who had joined it with half a heart or had even, like Marcus Cicero and his fellows, merely danced around the aristocracy like the witches around the Brocken-approached to make their peace with the new monarch, a peace accordingly which his contemptuous indulgence readily and courteously granted to the petitioners. But the flower of the defeated party made no compromise. All was over with the aristocracy; but the aristocrats could never become converted to monarchy. The highest revelations of humanity are perishable; the religion once true may become a lie,1 the polity once fraught with blessing may become a curse; but even the gospel that is past still * ----- mountains finds confe. man a green to its very ( ' , . . till it has dragged its last priests and its last; . . . . . . . . . . . . freed from those shadows of the er a world that has renewed its the pristocratic rule had now sunk, it had once been a great political system; the sacred fire, by which Italy had been conquered and Hannibal had been vanquished, continued to glow-although somewhat dim and dull-in the Roman nobility so long as that nobility existed, and rendered a cordial lenolpe to a gardenglonal . .

so far as to accept pardon nume Lacati' and a possible into private life; which, however, ordinarily was red done without the mental reservation of thereby preserving themselves for a future change of things. This roune was chiefly followed by the particans of lesser note; but the able Marcus Marcellus, the same who had brought about the rupture with Caesar (p. 320), was to be found among there judicious persons and voluntarily barnished himself to Lesbos. In the majority, however, of the genuine aristectacy parsion was rorer powerful than cool reflection; along with whitch, no dubt, self-deceptions as to success being still possible and apprehensions of the inevitable vengeance of the victor variously co-operated.

If may here state once for an this in this and other passion, where Mommers appears incidentally non-press level order or more publicable with which I service the control of the passion of the passion

No one probably formed a judgment as to the situation of affairs with so painful a clearness, and so free from fear or hope on his own account, as Marcus Cato. Completely convinced that after the days of Ilerda and Pharsalus the monarchy was inevitable, and morally firm enough to confess to himself this bitter truth and to act upon it, he hesitated for a moment whether the constitutional party ought at all to continue a war, which would necessarily require sacrifices for a lost cause on the part of many who did not know why they offered them. And when he resolved to fight against the monarchy not for victory, but for a speedier and more honourable fall, he vet sought as far as possible to draw no one into this war who chose to survive the fall of the republic and to be reconciled to monarchy. He conceived that, so long as the republic had been merely threatened, it was a right and a duty to compel the lukewarm and bad citizen to take part in the struggle; but that now it was senseless and cruel to compel the individual to share the ruin of the lost republic. Not only did he himself discharge every one who desired to return to Italy; but when the wildest of the wild partisans, Gnaeus Pompeius the younger, insisted on the execution of these people and of Cicero in particular, it was Cato alone who by his moral authority prevented it.

Pompeius also had no desire for peace. Had he been a man who deserved to hold the position which he filled, we might suppose him to have perceived that he who aspires to a crown cannot return to the beaten track of ordinary existence, and that there is accordingly no place left on earth for one who has failed. But Pompeius was hardly too noble-minded to ask a favour, which the victor would have been perhaps magnanimous enough not to refuse to him; on the contrary, he was probably too mean to do so. Whether it was that he could not make up his mind to trust himself to Caesar, or that in his usual vague and undecided way, after the first immediate impression of the disaster of Pharsalus had vanished, he began again to cherish hope, Pompeius was resolved to continue the struggle against Caesar and to seek for himself yet another battle-field after that of Pharsalus.

Thus however much Caesar had striven by prudence and moderation to appease the fury of his opponents and to lessen their number, the struggle nevertheless went on without alteration. But the leading men had almost all taken part in the fight at Pharsalus, and, although they all escaped with the exception of Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was killed m the flight, they were yet scattered in all directions, so that they were unable to concert a common plan for the continuance of the campaign Most of them found their way, partly through the desolate mountains of Macedonia and Illyria, partly by the aid of the fleet, to Corci ra, where Marcus Cato commanded the reserve left behind. Here a sort of council of war took place under the presidency of Cato, at which Metellus Scipio, Pitus Labienus, Lucius Afranius, Gnaeus Pompeius the younger, and others were present, but the absence of the commander inchief and the painful uncertainty as to his fate, as well as the internal dissensions of the party, prevented the adoption of any common resolution, and ultimately each took the course which seemed to him the most suitable for himself or for th common cause. It was in fact in a high degree difficult to say among the many straws to which they might possibly ching which was the one that would keep longest above water

Macedonia and Greece were lost by the battle of Phyrsalus It is true that Cato, who had immediately on the news of the defeat evacuated Dyrrhachium, still held Corcyra, and Rutilius Lupus the Peloponnesus, during a time for the constitutional party For a moment it seemed also as if the Pompeians would make a stand at Patrae in the Peloponnesus, but the accounts of the advance of Calenus sufficed to frighten them from that quarter As little was there any attempt to maintain Core; re On the Italian and Sicilian coasts the Pompeian squadrons despatched thither after the victories of Dyrrhachium (p. 355) had achieved not unimportant successes against the ports of Brundisium, Messana and Vibo and at Messana especially had burnt the whole fleet in course of being fitted out for Caesar, but the ships that were thus active, mostly from Asia Minor and Syria, were recalled by their communities in consequence of the Pharsalian battle, so that the expedition came to an er J of itself. In Asia Minor and Syria there were at the moment no troops of either party, with the exception of the Bosperan army of Pharnaces which had taken possession, estensit's or Carsar's account, of different regions belonging to his opponents In Egypt there was still indeed a considerable Roman array, formed of the troops left behind there by Latinus (p. 145) and thereafter recruited from Italian vagrants and Svr an or Gheian bandith, but it was self-evident and was soon offeral v confirmed by the recall of the Fgyp'tan vessels, that the erget

of Alexandria by no means had the intention of holding firmly by the defeated party or of even placing its force of troops at their disposal. Somewhat more favourable prospects presented themselves to the vanquished in the West. In Spain Pompeian sympathies were so strong among the army as well as among the population, that the Caesarians had on that account to give up the attack which they contemplated from this quarter against Africa, and an insurrection seemed inevitable, so soon as a leader of note should appear in the peninsula. In Africa moreover the coalition, or rather Juba king of Numidia, who was the true regent there, had been arming unmolested since the autumn of  $\frac{705}{49}$ . While the whole East was consequently lost to the coalition by the battle of Pharsalus, it might on the other hand continue the war after an honourable manner probably in Spain, and certainly in Africa; for to claim the aid of the king of Numidia, who had for a long time been subject to the Roman community, against revolutionary fellow-burgesses was for Romans a painful humiliation doubtless, but by no means an act of treason. Those again who in this conflict of despair had no further regard for right or honour, might declare themselves beyond the pale of the law, and commence hostilities as robbers; or might enter into alliance with independent neighbouring states, and introduce the public foe into the intestine strife; or, lastly, might profess monarchy with the lips and prosecute the restoration of the legitimate republic with the dagger of the assassin.

That the vanquished should withdraw and renounce the new monarchy was at least the natural and so far the truest expression of their desperate position. The mountains and above all the seas had been in those times ever since the memory of man the asylum not only of all crime, but also of intolerable misery and of oppressed right; it was natural for Pompeians and republicans to wage a defiant war against the monarchy of Caesar, which had ejected them, in the mountains and on the seas, and especially natural for them to take up piracy on a greater scale, with more compact organisation, and with more definite aims. Even after the recall of the squadrons that had come from the East they still possessed a very considerable fleet of their own, while Caesar was as yet virtually without vessels of war; and their connection with the Dalmatae who had risen in their own interest against Caesar (p. 372), and their control over the most important seas and seaports, presented the most advantageous prospects for a naval war, especially on a small scale As formerly Sulla's hunting out of the democrats had ended in the Settoman insurrection, which was a conflict first waged by pirates and then by robbers and ultimately became a very serious war, so possibly, if there was in the Catonian aristocracy or among the adherents of Pompeus as much spirit and fire as in the Marian democracy, and if there was found among them a true sea-king, a commonwealth independent of the monarchy of Caesar and perhaps a match for it might anse on the still unconquered sea

Far more serious disapproval in every respect is due to the idea of dragging an independent neighbouring state into the Roman civil war and of bringing about by its means a counter-revolution; law and conscience condemn the deserter rore severely than the robber, and a victorious band of robbers finds its way back to a free and well-ordered commonwealth more easily than the emigrants who are conducted back by the public foc. Besides it was scarcely probable that the beaten party would be able to effect a restoration in this way. The only state, from which they could attempt to seek support, was that of the Parthians; and as to this it was at least doubtful whether it would make their cause its own, and very improbable that it would fight out that cause against Caesar.

The time for republican conspiracies had not yet come.
While the remnant of the defeated party thus allowed themselves to be helplessly driven about by fate, and even those who personal capture would have probably paralysed a hall, and that perhaps the more dangerous hall, of his opponents. With a few men he crossed the Hellespont—his single back encountered in it a fleet of the enemy destined for the Black Sca and took the whole crews, struck as with stupefaction by the news of the battle of Pharsalus, prisoners—and as soon as the most necessary preparations were made, histened in purior of Pompeius to the East. The latter had gone from the Pharsalus battle-field to Lerbos, whence he brought away his wife and I second son Sextus, and had sailed onward round As a Miror to Chicia and therec to Cyprus. He might have joined fill particure at Coreyra or Africa; but repugnance toward his aristeraise allies and the thought of the reception which awarised him the after the day of Pharsalus and above all after the day of Pharsalus.

flight, appear to have induced him to take his own course and rather to resort to the protection of the Parthian king than to that of Cato. While he was employed in collecting money and slaves from the Roman revenue-farmers and merchants in Cyprus, and in arming a band of 2000 slaves, he received news that Antioch had declared for Caesar and that the route to the Parthians was no longer open. So he altered his plan and sailed to Egypt, where a number of his old soldiers served in the army and the situation and rich resources of the country allowed him time and opportunity to reorganise the war.

In Egypt, after the death of Ptolemy Auletes (May 7,03) his children. Cleopatra about sixteen years of age and Ptolemaeus Dionysus about ten, had ascended the throne according to their father's will jointly, and as consorts; but soon the brother or rather his guardian Pothinus had driven the sister from the kingdom and compelled her to seek a refuge in Syria, whence she made preparations to get back to her paternal kingdom. Ptolemaeus and Pothinus lay with the whole Egyptian army at Pelusium for the sake of protecting the eastern frontier against her, just when Pompeius cast anchor at the Casian promontory and sent a request to the king to allow him to land. The Egyptian court, long informed of the disaster at Pharsalus, was on the point of rejecting Pompeius; but the king's tutor Theodotus pointed out that in that case Pompeius would probably employ his connections in the Egyptian army to instigate rebellion; and that it would be safer, and also preferable with regard to Caesar, if they embraced the opportunity of making away with Pompeius. Political reasonings of this sort did not readily fail of their effect among the statesmen of the Hellenic world.

Achillas the general of the royal troops and some of the former soldiers of Pompeius went off in a boat to his vessel; and invited him to come to the king and, as the water was shallow, to enter their barge. As he was stepping ashore, the military tribune Lucius Septimius stabbed him from behind, under the eyes of his wife and son, who were compelled to be spectators of the murder from the deck of their vessel, without being able to rescue or revenge (28th September \(^{70.0}_{48}\)). On the same day on which thirteen years before he had entered the capital in triumph over Mithradates (p. 138), the man, who for a generation had been called the Great and for years had ruled Rome, died on the desert sands of the inhospitable Casian shore by the hand of one of his soldiers. A good officer, but otherwise of mediocre gifts of intellect and of heart, fate had with superhuman constancy for thirty years allowed him to solve all brilliant and toilless tasks; had permitted him to pluck all laurels planted and fostered by others, had presented to him all the conditions requisite for obtaining the supreme power-only in order to exhibit in his person an example of spurious greatness, to which history knows no parallel Of all pitiful parts there is none more pitiful than that of passing for more than one really is, and it is the fate of monarchy that this misfortune inevitably clings to it, for barely once in a thousand years does there arise among the people a man who is a king not merely in name, but in reality If this disproportion between semblance and reality has never perhaps been so prominently marked as in Pompeius, the fact may well excite grave reflection that it was precisely he who in a certain sense opened the series of Roman monarchs

When Caesar following the track of Pompeius arrived in the roadstead of Alexandria, all was already over. With deep agitation he turned away when the murderer brought to his ship the head of the man who had been his son in-law and for long years his colleague in rule, and to get whom alive into his power he had come to Egypt The dagger of the rash assassin precluded an answer to the question, how Caesar would have dealt with the captive Pompeius; but, while the humane sympathy, which still found a place in the great soul of Caesar side by side with ambition, enjoined that he should spare his former friend, his interest also required that he should annihilate Pompeius otherwise than by the executioner. Pompeius had been for twenty years the acknowledged ruler of Rome, a dominion so deeply rooted does not perish with the ruler's death The death of Pompeius did not break up the Pompeians, but gave to them, instead of an aged, incapable, and worn out chief, in his sons Gnaeus and Sextus two leaders, both of whom were young and active and the second was a man of decided capacity. To the newly-founded hereditary monarchy the hereditary pretendership attached itself at once like a parasite, and it was very doubtful whether by this change of persons Caesar did not lose more than he gamed

Meanwhile in Egypt Caesar had now nothing further to do, -1 the Damone and the Prentians expected that he would matters at once and in person, and firmly convinced that no resistance was to be expected either from the Roman garrison or from the court, being, moreover, in urgent pecuniary embarrassment, landed in Alexandria with the two amalgamated legions accompanying him to the number of 3200 men and 800 Celtic and German cavalry, took up his quarters in the royal palace, and proceeded to collect the necessary sums of money and to regulate the Egyptian succession, without allowing himself to be disturbed by the saucy remark of Pothinus that Caesar should not for such petty matters neglect his own so important affairs. In his dealing with the Egyptians he was just and even indulgent. Although the aid which they had given to Pompeius justified the imposing of a war contribution, the exhausted land was spared from this; and, while the arrears of the sum stipulated for in 6,9,5 (p. 145) and since then only about half paid were remitted, there was required merely a final payment of 10,000,000 denarii (£400,000). The belligerent brother and sister were enjoined immediately to suspend hostilities, and were invited to have their dispute investigated and decided by arbitration. They submitted; the royal boy was already in the palace and Cleopatra also presented herself there. Caesar adjudged the kingdom of Egypt, agreeably to the testament of Auletes, to the intermarried brother and sister Cleopatra and Ptolemaeus Dionysus, and further gave unasked the kingdom of Cypruscancelling the earlier act of annexation (p. 143)—as the appanage of the second-born of Egypt to the younger children of Auletes, Arsinge and Ptolemacus the younger.

But a storm was secretly preparing. Alexandria was a cosmopolitan city as well as Rome, hardly inferior to the Italian capital in the number of its inhabitants, far superior to it in stirring commercial spirit, in skill of handicraft, in taste for science and art: in the citizens there was a lively national self-importance, and, if there was no political sentiment, there was at any rate a turbulent spirit, which induced them to indulge in their street riots as regularly and as heartily as the Parisians of the present day: one may conceive their feelings, when they saw the Roman general ruling in the palace of the Lagidae and their kings accepting the award of his tribunal. Pothinus and the boy-king, both as may be conceived very much discontented at once with the peremptory requisition of old debts and with the intervention in the throne-dispute which could only issue as it did in favour of Cleopatra, sent—in order to the satisfaction of the Roman demands—the treasures of the temples and the gold plate of the king with intentional ostentation to be melted at the mint; with increasing indignation the Egyptians—who were pious even to superstition, and who rejoiced in the world-renowned magnificence of their court as if it were a possession of their own—heheld the hare walls of their temples and the wooden cups on the table of their king. The Roman army of occupation also, which had been essentially and runaway Italian criminals and slaves in its ranks, was indignant at Caesar by whose orders it had been obliged to susp

haug the r

and:

taught Caesar the immense danger in which he was placed with his small force in presence of that exasperated multitude. But it was difficult to return on account of the north-west winds prevailing at this season of the year, and the attempt at embarkation might easily become a signal for the outbreak of the insurrection; besides, it was not the nature of Caesar to depart without having accomplished his work. He accordingly ordered up at once reinforcements from Asia, and, till these armed, displayed throughout the utmost self-possession. Never was there greater gaiety in his camp than during this rest at Alexandria, and while the beautiful and clever Cleopatra was not sparing of her charms in general and least of all towards her judge, Caesar also appeared among all his victories to value most those won over beautiful women. It was a merry prelude to a very grave drama. Under the leadership of Achillas and, as was afterwards proved, by the secret orders of the king and his guardian, the Roman army of occupation stationed m Egypt appeared unexpectedly in Alexandria; and as soon as the citizens saw that it had come to attack Caesar, they made common cause with the soldiers.

With a presence of mind, which in some measure justifier his earlier foolhardiness, Caesar hastily collected his scattered men; seized the persons of the Ling and his minister; entereched himself in the toyal residence and the adjourng theatre; and gave orders, as there was no time to place in safety the war fleet stationed in the principal harbour immediately in front of the theatre, that it should be burnt and that

Pharos, the island with the light-tower commanding the harbour, should be occupied by means of boats. Thus at least a restricted position for defence was secured, and the way was kept open to procure supplies and reinforcements. At the same time orders were issued to the commandant of Asia Minor as well as to the nearest subject countries, the Syrians and Nabataeans, the Cretans and the Rhodians, to send troops and ships in all haste to Egypt. The insurrection at the head of which the princess Arsinoe and her confident the eunuch Ganymedes had placed themselves, meanwhile had free course in all Egypt and in the greater part of the capital. In the streets of the latter there was daily fighting, but without success either on the part of Caesar in gaining freer scope and breaking through to the fresh water lake of Marea which lay behind the town, where he could have provided himself with water and forage, or on the part of the Alexandrians in acquiring superiority over the besieged and depriving them of all drinkable water; for, when the Nile canals in Caesar's part of the town had been spoiled by the introduction of salt water, drinkable water was unexpectedly found in the wells dug on the beach.

As Caesar was not to be overcome from the landward side, the exertions of the besiegers were directed to destroy his fleet and cut him off from the sea by which supplies reached him. The island with the light-house and the mole by which this was connected with the mainland divided the harbour into a western and an eastern half, which were in communication with each other through two arched openings in the mole. Caesar commanded the island and the east harbour, while the mole and west harbour were in possession of the citizens; and, as the Alexandrian fleet was burnt, his vessels sailed in and out without hindrance. The Alexandrians, after having vainly attempted to introduce fire-ships from the western into the eastern harbour, equipped with the remnant of their arsenal a small squadron and with this blocked up the way of Caesar's vessels, when these were towing in a fleet of transports with a legion that had arrived from Asia Minor; but the excellent Rhodian mariners of Caesar mastered the enemy. Not long afterwards, however, the citizens captured the lighthouse-island, and from that point him and sued for peace, and his troops, when they saw him return as victor from the side opposite to that by which he had set forth, welcomed him with boundless joy. The fate of the town, which had ventured to thwart the plans of the master of the world and had brought him within a hair's breadth of destruction, let in Caesar's hands, but he was too much of a ruler to be sensitive, and dealt with the Alexandrians as with the Massiliots Caesar-pointing to their city severely devasted and deprived of its granaries, of its world renowned library, and of other important public buildings on occasion of the burning of the fleet-exhorted the inhabitants in future earnestly to cultivate the arts of peace alone, and to heal the wounds which they had inflicted on themselves, for the rest, he contented himself with granting to the Jews settled in Alexandria the same rights which the Greek population of the city enjoyed, and with placing in Alexandria, instead of the previous Roman army of occupation which nominally at least obeyed the king of Egypt, a formal Roman garrison-two of the legions be steged there, and a third which afterwards armed from Syriaunder a commander nominated by himself I'or this position of trust a man was purposely selected, whose birth made it impossible for him to abuse it—Rufio, an able soldier, but the son of a freedman Cleonatra and her younger brother Ptole son of a freedman Geopatra and ner younger maeus obtained the sovereignty of Egypt under the supremacy of Rome, the princess Arsince was carried off to Italy, that she individual dynasts, Cyprus became again a part of the Roman province of Chicia

¹ The loss of the lighthouse-island must, along with the description of a second naval engagement in which the Egyptian fleet beaten at Chersonesus was annihilated, have been inserted where there is now a chasm (B. A. 12), for the island was at first in Caesar's power (B. C. iii. 12; B. A. 8). The mole must have been constantly in the power of the enemy, for Caesar held intercourse with the island only by ships.

, much

This Alexandrian insurrection, insignificant as it was in itself and slight as was its intrinsic connection with the events of importance in the world's history which tool place at the same time in the Romain state, had nevertheless so far a momentous influence on them that it compelled the man, who was all in all and without whom nothing could be transacted and nothing could be solved, to leave his proper tasks in abstance from October 'Ale up to March 'All not not to fait along with Jews and Bedouins against a city rabble. The consequences of personal rule began to make themelves felt. They had the monarchy, but the wildest confusion prevailed everywhere, and the monarch was absent. The Caesarians were for the moment, just like the Pompeians, without superinterdence, the ability of the individual officers and, above all, accident decided matters everywhere.

In Asia Minor there was, at the time of Caesar's departure for Egypt, no enemy. But Caesar's lieutenant there, the able Gnaeus Domitius Calvinus, had received orders to take away again from king Pharnaces what he had without instructions wrested from the allies of Pompeius; and, as Pharnaces, an obstinate and arrogant despot like his father, perseveringly refused to evacuate Lesser Armenia, no course remained but to march against him. Calvinus had been obliged to despatch to Egypt two out of the three legions—formed out of the Pharsalian prisoners of war—left behind with him; he filled up the gap by one legion hastily gathered from the Romans domiciled in Pontus and two legions of Deiotarus exercised after the Roman manner, and advanced into Lesser Armenia. But the Bosporan army, tried in numerous conflicts with the dwellers on the Black Sea, showed itself more efficient than that of Calvinus.

In an engagement at Nicopolis the Pontic levy of Calvinus was cut to pieces and the Galatian legions ran off; only the one old legion of the Romans fought its way through with moderate loss. Instead of conquering Lesser Armenia, Calvinus could not even prevent Pharnaces from repossessing himself of his Pontic "hereditary states," and pouring forth the whole vials of his hateful sultanic caprices on their inhabitants, especially the unhappy Amisenes (winter of  $\frac{706}{48} = \frac{707}{47}$ ). When Caesar in person arrived in Asia Minor and intimated to him that the service which Pharnaces had rendered to him personally by granting no help to Pompeius could not be taken into account against the injury inflicted on the empire, and that before any negotiation he must evacuate the province of Pontus and send back the property which he had pillaged, he declared himself ready to submit; nevertheless, well knowing how good reason Caesar had for hastening to the West, he made no serious preparations for the evacuation. He did not know that Caesar finished whatever he took in hand. Without negotiating further. Caesar took with him the one legion which he brought from Alexandria and the troops of Calvinus and Deiotarus, and advanced against the camp of Pharnaces at Ziela. When the Bosporans saw him approach, they boldly crossed the deep mountain-ravine which covered their front, and charged the Romans up the hill. Caesar's soldiers were still occupied in pitching their camp, and the ranks wavered for a moment:

but the veterans accustomed to war rapidly rallied and set the example for a general attack and for a complete victory (and August 221). In five days the campaign was ended—an invaluable piece of good fortune at this time, when every hour was precious

Caesar entrusted the pursuit of the king, who had gone home by way of Smope, to Pharmaces' illegitumate brother, the brave Mithradates of Pergamus, who as a reward for the services rendered by bim in Egypt received the crown of the Bosporan kingdom in room of Pharmaces. In other respects the affairs of Syria and Asia Minor were peacefully settled, Caesar sown allies were richly rewarded, those of Pompeius were in general dismissed with fines or reprimands. Denotaria alone the most powerful of the clients of Pompeius, was again confined to his narrow hereditary domain, the canton of the Tolstobog. In his stead Ariobarzanes king of Cappadocia was miested with Lesser Armenia, and the tetrarchy of the Trocmi usurped by Deiotarius was conferred on the new king of the Bosporus, who was descended by the matemal side from one of the Galatian princely houses as by the paternal from that of Pontus

In Illyria also, while Caesar was in Egypt, incidents of a very grave nature had occurred The Dalmatian coast had been for centuries an annoyance to the Roman rule, and its inhabitants had been at open feud with Caesar from the time of his governorship, while the interior also swarmed since the time of the Thessalian war with dispersed Pompeians Quintus Cornificius had however, with the legions that followed him from Italy, kept both the natives and the refugees in check and had at the same time sufficiently managed the difficult task of provisioning the troops in these rugged districts Even when the able Marcus Octavrus, the victor of Cuneta (p 371), appeared with part of the Pompeian fleet in these waters to wage war against Caesar by sea and land, Comificus rot only knew how to maintain himself, resting for support on the ships and the harbour of the Indertini (Zara), but in his tum also sustained several successful engagements at sea with the flert of his antagonist. But when the new governor of Illyria, the Aulus Gabinus recalled by Caesar from exile (p. 299) arrived by the landward route in Illyria in the winter of 700 July with fifteen cohorts and 3000 horse, the system of warfare changed Instead of confining himself like his predecessor to war on a small scale, the bold active man undertook at once, in spite of the inclement season, an expedition with his whole force to the mountains. But the unfavourable weather, the difficulty of providing supplies, and the brave resistance of the Dalmatians, swept away the army; Gabinius had to commence his retreat, was attacked in the course of it and disgracefully defeated by the Dalmatians, and with the feeble remains of his fine army had difficulty in reaching Salonae, where he soon afterwards died. Most of the Illyrian coast towns thereupon surrendered to the fleet of Oetavius; those that adhered to Caesar, such as Salonae and Epidaurus (Ragusa Veechia), were so hard pressed by the fleet at sea and by the barbarians on land, that the surrender and capitulation of the remains of the army enclosed in Salonae seemed not far distant. Then the commandant of the depôt at Brundisium, the energetic Publius Vatinius, in the absence of ships of war caused common boats to be provided with beaks and manned with the soldiers dismissed from the hospitals, and with this extemporised war-fleet gave battle to the far superior fleet of Octavius at the island of Tauris (Torcola between Lesina and Curzola)-a battle in which, as in so many eases, the bravery of the leader and of the marines eompensated for the deficiencies of the vessels, and the Caesarians achieved a brilliant victory. Marcus Octavius lest these waters and proceeded to Africa (spring of  $\frac{70.7}{4.7}$ ); the Dalmatians no doubt continued their resistance for years with great obstinacy, but it was nothing beyond a local mountainwarfare. When Caesar returned from Egypt, his resolute adjutant had already got rid of the danger that was imminent in Illyria.

All the more serious was the position of things in Africa, where the constitutional party had from the outset of the civil war ruled absolutely and had continually augmented their power. Down to the battle of Pharsalus king Juba had, strietly speaking, borne rule there; he had vanquished Curio, and his flying horsemen and his numberless arehers were the main strength of the army; the Pompeian governor Varus played by his side so subordinate a part that he even had to deliver those soldiers of Curio who had surrendered to him over to the king, and had to look on while they were executed or earried away into the interior of Numidia. After the battle of Pharsalus a change took place. With the exception of Pompeius himself, hardly a man of note among the defeated party thought of flight to the Parthians. As little did they attempt to hold the sea with their united resources; the warfare waged by Marcus Octavius in the Illyrian waters was isolated, and was without permanent success. The great majority of the republicans as of the Pompeians betook themselves to Africa, where alone an honourable and constitutional warfare might still be waged against the usurper There the fragments of the army scattered at Pharsalus, the troops that had garrisoned Dyrrhachium, Corcyra, and the Peloponnesus, the remains of the Illyrian fleet, gradually congregated, there the second commander in-chief Metellus Scipio, the two sons of Pompeius, Gnaeus and Sextus, the political leader of the republicans Marcus Cato, the able officers Labienus, Afranius, Petreius, Octavius and others met. If the resources of the emigrants had diminished, their fanaticism had if possible increased Not only did they continue to murder their prisoners and even the officers of Caesar under flag of truce, but king Juba, in whom the exasperation of the partisan mingled with the fury of the half barbarous African, laid down the maxim that in every community suspected of sympathising with the enemy the burgesses ought to be extirpated and the town burnt, and even practically carried out this theory against some townships, such as the unfortunate Vaga near Hadrumetum. In fact it was solely owing to the energetic intervention of Cato that the capital of the province itself, the flourishing Unca-which, just like Carthage formerly, had been long regarded with a jealous eye by the Numidian kings-did not experience the same treatment from Juba, and that measures of precaution merely were adopted against its citizens, who certainly were not unjustly accused of leaning towards Caesar.

As neither Caesar himself nor any of his heutenants undertook the smallest movement against Africa, the coalition had full time to acquire political and military reorganisation there First of all, it was necessary to fill up anew the place of commander in-chief vacant by the death of Pompeius king Juba was not disinclined still to maintain the position which he had held in Africa up to the battle of Pharsalus, indeed he bore hunself no longer as a client of the Romans but as an equal ally or even as a protector, and took it upon him, for example, to com Roman silver money with his name and device, nay, he even raised a claim to be the sole weater of purple in the camp, and suggested to the Roman commanders that they should lay aside their purple mantle of office Metellus Scipio, moreover, demanded the supreme command for himself, because Pompeius had recognised him in the Thessalian campaign at on a footing of equality, more from the consideration that he was his son-in-law than on military grounds. The like demand was raised by Varus as the governor—self-nominated, it is true of Africa, seeing that the war was to be waged in his province. Lastly the army desired for its leader the propraetor Marcus Cato. Obviously it was right. Cato was the only man who possessed the requisite devotedness, energy, and authority for the difficult office; if he was no military man, it was infinitely better to appoint as commander-in-chief a non-military man who understood how to listen to reason and make his subordinates act, than an officer of untried capacity like Varus, or one of tried incapacity like Metellus Scipio. But the decision fell at length on this same Scipio, and it was Cato himself who mainly determined that decision. He did so, not because he felt himself unequal to the task, or because his vanity found its account rather in declining than in accepting; still less because he loved or respected Scipio, with whom he on the contrary was personally at variance, and who with his notorious inefficiency had attained a certain importance merely in virtue of his position as father-in-law to Pompeius; but simply and solely because his obstinate legal formalism chose rather to let the republic go to ruin in due course of law than to save it in an irregular way. When after the battle of Pharsalus he met with Marcus Cicero at Corcyra, he had offered to hand over the command in Corcyra to the latter—who was still from the time of his Cilician administration invested with the rank of general—as the officer of higher standing according to the letter of the law, and by this readiness had driven the unfortunate advocate, who now cursed a thousand times his laurels from the Amanus. almost to despair; but he had at the same time astonished all men of any tolerable discernment. The same principles were applied now, when something more was at stake; Cato weighed the question to whom the place of commander-in-chief belonged, as if the matter had reference to a field at Tusculum, and adjudged it to Scipio. By this sentence his own candidature and that of Varus were set aside. But he it was also, and he alone, who confronted with energy the claims of king Juba, and made him feel that the Roman nobility came to him not suppliant as to the great prince of the Parthians with a view to ask aid at the hands of a protector, but as entitled to command and require aid from a subject. In the present state of the Roman forces in Africa Juba could not avoid lowering his claims to some extent; although he still carried the point with the weak Scipio, that the pay of his troops should be charged on the Roman treasury and the cession of the province of Africa should be assured to him in the event of victory.

By the side of the new general-in-chief the senate of the "three hundred" again emerged. It established its seat in three hundred again emerged.

the zeal of Cato, with the greatest energy, and every man customs of arms, even the freedman and Libyan, was enrolled in the infantry numbered fourteen legions, of which two were micage raised by Varus, eight others were formed partly from the refugees, partly from the conscripts in the province and four were legions of Ling Juba armed in the Roman manner. The heavy cavalry, consisting of the Celts and Germans who arrived with Labienus and sundry others incorporated in their ranks, was, apart from Juba's squadron of cavalry equipped in the Roman style, 1600 strong The light troops consisted of innumerable masses of Numidians riding without bridle or rein and armed merely with javelins, of a number of mounted bowmen, and a large host of archers on foot. To these fell to be added Juba's 120 elephants, and the fleet of 55 sail commanded by Publius Varus and Marcus Octavius. The urgent want of money was in some measure remedied by a self-taxation on the part of the senate, which was the more productive as the nehest African capitalists had been induced to enter it. Corn and other supplies were accumulated in immense quantities in the fortresses capable of defence; at the same time the stores were as much as possible removed from the open towns. The absence of Caesar, the troublesome temper of his legions, the agitation in Spain and Italy gradually raised men's spirits and the recollection of the Pharsalian defeat began to give way to fresh hopes of victory.

The time lost by Caesar in Egypt nowhere recogned itself more severely than here. Had he proceeded to Alrica immediately after the death of Pompeus, he would have found there a neak, disorganised, and frightened army and atternancely among the leaders; whereas there was now in Alrica, owing more especially to Lap's energy, an army equal in number to that defeated at Pharsaids, under leaders of note, and under

A peculiar evil star seemed altogether to preside over this African expedition of Caesar. He had, even before his embarkation for Egypt, arranged in Spain and Italy various measures preliminary and preparatory to the African war; but out of all there had sprung nothing but mischief. From Spain, according to Caesar's arrangement, the governor of the southern province Quintus Cassius Longinus was to cross with four legions to Africa, to form a junction there with Bogud king of West Mauretania, and to advance with him towards Numidia and Africa. But that army destined for Africa included in it a number of native Spaniards and two whole legions formerly Pompeian; Pompeian sympathies prevailed in the army as in the province, and the unskilful and tyrannical behaviour of the Caesarian governor was not fitted to allay them. A formal revolt took place; troops and towns took part for or against the governor; already those who had risen against the lieutenant of Caesar were on the point of openly displaying the banner of Pompeius; already had Pompeius' elder son Gnaeus embarked from Africa for Spain to take advantage of this favourable turn, when the disavowal of the governor by the most respectable Caesarians themselves and the interference of the commander of the northern province suppressed just in right time the insurrection. Gnaeus Pompeius, who had lost time on the way with a vain attempt to establish himself in Mauretania, came too late; Gaius Trebonius, whom Caesar after his return from the East sent to Spain to relieve Cassius (autumn of  $\frac{709}{45}$ , met everywhere with absolute obedience. But of course amidst these blunders nothing was done from Spain to disturb the organisation of the republicans in Africa;

The shape which the states in north-western Africa assumed during this period is very obscure. After the Jugurthine war Bocchus king of Mauretania ruled probably from the western sea to the port of Saldae, in what is now Morocco and Algiers (iii. 152); the princes of Tingis (Tangiers)—probably from the outset different from the Mauretanian sovereigns—who occur even earlier (Plut. Sert. 9), and to whom it may be conjectured that Sallust's Leptasta (Hist. ii. 31 Kritz) and Cicero's Mastanesosus (In Vat. 5, 12) belong, may have been independent within certain limits or may have held from him as feudatories; just as Syphax already ruled over many chieftains of tribes (Appian. Pun. 10), and about this time in the neighbouring Numidia Cirta was possessed, probably however under Juba's supremacy, by the prince Massinissa (Appian. B. C. iv. 54). About  $\frac{672}{82}$  we find in Bocchus's tead a king called Bocut or Bogud (iii. 323), probably the son of Bocchus. From  $\frac{705}{49}$  the kingdom appears divided between king Bogud who possesses the western, and king Bocchus who possesses the eastern half, and to this the later partition of Mauretania into Bogud's kingdom or the state of Tingis and Bocchus' kingdom or the state of Jol (Caesarea) refers (Plin. H. N. v. 2; 19°, comp. Bell. Afric. 23)

indeed in consequence of the complications with Longinus Bogud king of West Mauretania, who was on Caesar's side and might at least have put some obstacles in the way of king Juba, had been called away with his troops to Spain

Still more critical were the occurrences among the troops whom Caesar had caused to be collected in southern Italy, in order to his embarkation with them for Africa. They were for the most part the old legions, which had founded Caesar's throne in Gaul, Spain, and Thessaly. The spirit of these troops had not been improved by victories, and had been utterly disorganised by long repose in Lower Italy. The almost superhuman demands which the general made on them, and the effects of which were only too clearly apparent in their fearfully thinned ranks, left behind even in these men of iron a leaven of secret rancour which required only time and quiet to set their minds in a ferment. The only man who had influence (... Amer had been absent and almost unleard-of for a veri

e conthem lers to ee the luxurious case of Campania of a living in our interior to those of Spain and Thessaly in point of hardship, the reins, which had been too long relaxed and were too sudderly tightened, snapt asunder. The legions refused to obey till the promised presents were paid to them, scomfully repulsed the product preserve and even three stones at them. An masses to extort the rumanene et out in

in the capital Several officers, who attempted to restrain the mutinous bands on the way, were slain. It was a formulable danger. Caesar ordered the few soldiers who were in the city occupy the gates, with the view of warding off the justly who first onset, and suddenly respecting to them, they might apply to him on the div when he and the other soldiers should triumph; in the triumph itself

they could not of course participate, as having been previously discharged. The masses were not prepared for things taking this turn; convinced that Caesar could not do without them for the African campaign, they had demanded their discharge only in order that, if it were refused, they might annex their own conditions to their service. Half unsettled in their belief as to their own indispensableness; too awkward to return to their object, and to bring the negotiation which had missed its course back to the right channel; ashamed, as men, by the fidelity with which the imperator kept his word even to soldiers who had forgotten their allegiance, and by his generosity which even now granted far more than he had ever promised; deeply affected, as soldiers, when the general presented to them the prospect of their being necessarily mere civilian spectators of the triumph of their comrades, and when he called them no longer "comrades" but "burgesses"—by this very form of address, which from his mouth sounded so strangely, destroying as it were with one blow the whole pride of their past soldierly career; and, besides all this, under the spell of the man whose presence had an irresistible power—the soldiers stood for a while mute and lingering, till from all sides a cry arose that the general would once more receive them into favour and again permit them to be called Caesar's soldiers. Caesar, after having had a sufficient amount of entreaty, granted the permission; but the ringleaders in this mutiny had a third cut off from their triumphal presents. History knows no greater psychological masterpiece, and none that was more completely successful.

This mutiny operated injuriously on the African campaign, at least in so far as it considerably delayed the commencement of it. When Caesar arrived at the port of Lilybaeum destined for the embarkation, the ten legions intended for Africa were far from being fully assembled there, and it was the experienced troops that were farthest behind. Hardly however had six legions, of which five were newly formed, arrived there and the necessary war vessels and transports come forward, when Caesar put to sea with them (25th December 707 of the uncorrected, about 8th October of the Julian, calendar). The enemy's fleet, which on account of the prevailing equinoctial gales was drawn up on the beach at the island Aegimurus in front of the bay of Carthage, did not oppose the passage; but the same storms scattered the fleet of Caesar in all directions, and, when he availed himself of the opportunity of landing not far from Hadrumetum (Susa), he could not disembark more than some

3000 men, mostly recruits, and 150 horsemen. His attempt to capture Hadrumetum strongly occupied by the enemy miscarried, but Caesar possessed himself of the two seaports not far distant from each other, Ruspina (Sahalil near Susa) and Little Leptis Here he entrenched himself; but his position was so insecure that he kept his cavalry in the ships and the ships ready for sea and provided with a supply of water, in order to re embark at any moment if he should be attacked by a superior force This however was not necessary, for just at the right time the ships that had been driven out of their course arrived (3rd January 198) On the very following day Caesar, whose army suffered in consequence of the arrangements made by the Pompeians from want of corn, undertook with three legions an expedition into the interior of the country, but was attacked on the march not far from Ruspina by the corps which Labienus had brought up to dislodge Caesar from the coast As Labienus had exclusively cavalry and archers, and Caesar almost nothing but infantry of the line, the leg ons were quickly surrounded and exposed to the missiles of the enemy, without being able to retaliate or to attack with success No doubt the deploying of the entire line relieved once more the flanks, and spirited charges saved the honour of their arms, but a retreat was unavoidable, and had Ruspina not been so near, the Moorish javelin would perhaps have accomplished the same result here as the Parthian bow at Carrhae

Caesar, whom this day had fully convinced of the difficulty of the impending war, would not again expose his soldiers untried and discouraged by the new mode of fighting to any such attack, but awaited the arrival of his veteran legions. The interval was employed in providing some sort of compensation against the crushing superiority of the enemy in the weapons of distant warfare. The incorporation of the suitable men from the fleet as light horsemen or archers in the land army could not be of much avail. The diversions which Caesar procured were somewhat more effectual. He succeeded in bringing into arms against Juba the Gaetulian pastoral tribes wandering on the southern slope of the great Atlas towards the Sahara, for the commotions of the Marian and Sullan period had reached even to them, and their indignation against Pompeius, who had at that time made them subordinate to the Numidian kings (in 324), rendered them from the onse favourably inclined to the heir of the mighty Marius of whose Jugurthine campaign they had still a lively recollection. The Mauretanian kings, Bogud in Tingis and Bocchus in Jol, were Tuba's natural rivals and to a certain extent long since in alliance with Caesar. Further, there still roamed in the border-region between the kingdoms of Juba and Bocchus the last of the Catilinarians, that Publius Sittius of Nuceria (p. 158), who eighteen years before had become converted from a bankrupt Italian merchant into a Mauretanian leader of free bands, and since that time had procured for himself a name and a body of retainers amidst the Libyan quarrels. Bocchus and Sittius united fell on the Numidian land, and occupied the important town of Cirta; and their attack, as well as that of the Gaetulians, compelled king Juba to send a portion of his troops to his southern and western frontiers.

Caesar's situation, however, continued sufficiently unpleasant. His army was crowded together within a space of six square miles; though the fleet conveyed corn, the want of forage was as much felt by Caesar's cavalry as by those of Pompeius before Dyrrhachium. The light troops of the enemy remained notwithstanding all the exertions of Caesar so immeasurably superior to his, that it seemed almost impossible to carry aggressive operations into the interior even with veterans. If Scipio retired and abandoned the coast towns, he might perhaps achieve a victory like those which the vizier of Orodes had won over Crassus and Juba over Curio, and he could at least endlessly protract the war. The simplest consideration suggested this plan of campaign; even Cato, although far from a strategist, counselled its adoption, and offered at the same time to cross with a corps to Italy and to call the republicans to armswhich, amidst the utter confusion there, might very well meet with success. But Cato could only advise, not command; Scipio the commander-in-chief decided that the war should be carried on in the region of the coast. This was a blunder, not merely inasmuch as they thereby dropped a plan of war promising a sure result, but also inasmuch as the region to which they transferred the war was in dangerous agitation, and a good part of the army which they opposed to Caesar was likewise in a troublesome temper. The fearfully strict levy, the carrying off of the supplies, the devastating of the smaller townships, the feeling in general that they were being sacrificed for a cause which from the outset was foreign to them and was already lost, had exasperated the native population against the Roman republicans fighting out their last struggle of despair on African soil; and the terrorist proceedings of the latter against all communities that were but suspected of indifference (p 410), had raised this exasperation to the most intense hatred. The African towns declared, wherever they could venture to do so, for Caesar, among the Gaetulians and the Libyans, who served in numbers among the light troops and even in the legions, desertion was spreading But Scipio with all the obstinacy characteristic of folly persevered in his plan, marched with all his force from Utica to appear before the towns of Ruspina and Little Leptis occupied by Caesar, furnished Hadrumetum to the north and Thapsus to the south (on the promontory Ras ed Dimas) with strong garrisons, and in concert with Juba, who likewise appeared before Ruspina with all his troops not required by the defence of the frontier, offered battle repeatedly to the enemy But Caesar was resolved to wait for his veteran legions. As these one after another armsed and appeared on the scene of strife. Scipio and Juba lost the desire to risk a them to

cavalry

skirmishes in the neighbourhood of Ruspina and Thapsus, which chiefly had relation to the finding out of the concealed store pits (silos) common in the country, and to the extension of posts Caesar, compelled by the enemy's horsemen to keep as much as possible to the heights or to cos er his flanks by entrenched lines, jet accustomed his soldiers gradually during this labonous and apparently endless warfare to the foreign mode of fighting Friend and foe hardly recognised the rapid general in the cautious of fence who trained his men carefully and not un frequently in person, and they became almost puzzled by the masterly skill which displayed itself as conspicuously in delay

as in promptitude of action

At last Caesar, after being joined by his last reinforcements, made a lateral movement towards Thapsus Scipio had as we have said, strongly garrisoned this town, and thereby com mitted the blunder of presenting to his opponent an object of attack easy to be seized, to this first error he soon added the second still less excusable blunder of now for the rescue of Thapsus giving the battle, which Caesar had wished and Scipio had hitherto rightly refused, on ground which placed the decisior in the hands of the infantry of the line Immediately along the shore, opposite to Caesar's camp, the legions of Scipio and Julia appeared, the fore ranks ready for fighting, the hinder ranks occupied in forming an entrenched camp; at the same time the garrison of Thapsus prepared for a sally. Caesar's camp-guard sufficed to repulse the latter. His legions, accustomed to war, already forming a correct estimate of the enemy from the want of precision in their mode of array and their ill-closed ranks, while the entrenching was still going forward on that side, and before even the general gave the signal, compelled a trumpeter to sound for the attack, and advanced along the whole line headed by Caesar himself, who, when he saw his men advance without waiting for his orders, galloped forward to lead them against the enemy. The right wing, in advance of the other divisions, frightened the line of elephants opposed to it—this was the last great battle in which these animals were employed -by throwing bullets and arrows, so that they wheeled round on their own ranks. The covering force was cut down, the left wing of the enemy was broken, and the whole line was overthrown. The defeat was the more destructive, as the new camp of the beaten army was not yet ready and the old one was at a considerable distance; both were successively captured almost without resistance. The mass of the defeated army threw away their arms and sued for quarter; but Caesar's soldiers were no longer the same who had readily refrained from battle before Ilerda and honourably spared the defenceless at Phar-The habit of civil war and the rancour left behind by the mutiny asserted their power in a terrible manner on the battle-field of Thapsus. If the hydra with which they fought always put forth new energies, if the army was hurried from Italy to Spain, from Spain to Macedonia, from Macedonia to Africa, and if the repose ever more eagerly longed for never came, the soldier sought, and not wholly without cause, the reason of this state of things in the unseasonable clemency of Caesar. had sworn to retrieve the general's neglect, and remained deaf to the entreaties of his disarmed fellow-citizens as well as to the commands of Caesar and the superior officers. thousand corpses that covered the battle-field of Thapsus, among whom were several Caesarian officers known as secret opponents of the new monarchy, and therefore killed on this occasion by their own men, showed how the soldier procures for himself repose. The victorious army on the other hand numbered no more than fifty dead (6th April 708).

There was as little a continuance of the struggle in Africa after the battle of Thapsus as there had been a year and a half before in the East after the defeat of Pharsalus. Cato as commandant of Utica convoked the senate, set forth how the means of defence stood, and submitted it to the decision of those assembled whether they would yield or defend themselves to the last man-only adjuring them to resolve and to act not each one for himself, but all in unison. The more courageous view found several supporters; it was proposed to manumit on behalf of the state the slaves capable of arms, which however Cato rejected as an illegal interference with private property, and suggested in its stead a patriotic appeal to the slave-owners. But soon this fit of resolution in an assembly consisting in great part of African merchants passed off, and they agreed to capitulate. Thereupon when Faustus Sulla, son of the regent, and Lucius Afranius arrived in Utica with a strong division of cavalry from the field of battle. Cato still made an attempt to hold the town through them; but he indignantly rejected their demand to let them first of all put to death the untrustworthy citizens of Utica en masse, and chose to let the last stronghold of the republicans fall into the hands of the monarch without resistance rather than to profane the last moments of the republic by such a massacre. After he had-partly by his

not to trust themselves to Caesar's mercy the means of might, and to those who wished to remain the opportunity of expituating under the most tolerable conditions, so far as his ability reached; and after having thoroughly satisfied himself that be could render to no one any farther aid, be held himself released from his command, retired to his bedchamber, and plunged his sword into his breast.

Of the other fugitive leaders only a few escaped. The tavalry that field from Thapsus encountered the bands of Sittius, and were cut c.

Faustus w not order by his vet

by his vet the fleet of the defeated party fell into the power of the crusers of Sittius and, when they were about to lay hands on him, stabbed himself. King Juba, not unprepared for such an issue, had in that case resolved to due in a way which seemed to him befitting a king, and had caused an enormous funeral pile to be prepared in the market-place of his city Zama, which was intended to consume along with his body all his treasures and the dead bodies of the whole citizens of Zama. But the inhabitants of the town showed no desire to let themselves be employed by way of decoration for the funeral rites of the African Sardanapalus; and they closed the gates against the king when fleeing from the battle-field he appeared, accompanied by Marcus Petreius, before their city. The king—one of those natures that become savage amidst a life of dazzling and insolent enjoyment, and prepare for themselves even out of death an intoxicating feast—resorted with his companion to one of his country houses, caused a copious banquet to be served up, and at the close of the feast challenged Petreius to fight him to death in single combat. It was the victor of Catilina that received his death at the hand of the king; the latter thereupon caused himself to be stabbed by one of his slaves. The few men of eminence that escaped, such as Labienus and Sextus Pompeius, followed the elder brother of the latter to Spain and sought, like Sertorius formerly, the last refuge of robbers and pirates in the waters and the mountains of that still half-independent land.

Without resistance Caesar regulated the affairs of Africa. As Curio had already proposed, the kingdom of Massinissa was broken up. The most eastern portion or region of Sitifis was united with the kingdom of Bocchus king of East Mauretania (iii. 152), and the faithful king Bogud of Tingis was rewarded with considerable gifts. Cirta (Constantine) and the surrounding district, hitherto possessed under the supremacy of Juba by the prince Massinissa and his son Arabion, were conferred on the condottiere Publius Sittius that he might settle his half-Roman bands there; 1 but at the same time this district, as well as by far the largest and most fertile portion of the late Numidian kingdom, were united as "New Africa" with the older province of Africa, and the defence of the country along the coast against the roving tribes of the desert, which the republic had entrusted to a client-king, was imposed by the new monarch on the empire itself.

The struggle, which Pompeius and the republicans had undertaken against the monarchy of Caesar, thus terminated, after having lasted for four years, in the complete victory of the new monarch. No doubt the monarchy was not established for the first time on the battle-fields of Pharsalus and Thapsus; it might already be dated from the moment when Pompeius and

&lt;sup>1</sup> The inscriptions of the region referred to preserve numerous traces of this colonisation. The name of the Sittii is there unusually frequent; the African township Milev bears as Roman the name colonia Sarneusis (Renier, Inscr. 1254, 2323, 2324), evidently from the Nucerian river-god Sarnus (Sueton. Rhet. 4).

Caesar in league had established their joint rule and overthrown the previous aristocratic constitution. Yet it was only those baptisms of blood of the 9th August 148 and the 6th April 148 that set aside the joint rule so opposed to the nature of absolute dominion, and conferred fixity and formal recognition on the new monarchy. Risings of pretenders and republican conspiracies might ensue and provoke new commotions, perhaps even new revolutions and restorations, but the continuity of the free republic that had been unnterrupted for five hundred years was broken through, and monarchy was established throughout the range of the Roman empire by the legitimacy of accomplished fact.

The constitutional struggle was at an end, and that it was so, was proclaimed by Marcus Cato when he fell on his sword at Utica For many years he had been the foremost man in the struggle of the legitimate republic against its oppressors, he had continued it long after he had ceased to cherish any hope of victory But now the struggle itself had become impossible, the republic which Marcus Brutus had founded was dead and never to be revived, what were the republicans now to do on the earth? The treasure was carried off, the sentinels were thereby relieved, who could blame them if they departed? There was more nobility, and above all more judgment, in the death of Cato than there had been in his life Cato was anything but a great man, but with all that shortsightedness, that pera versity, that dry prolixity, and those spurious phrases which have stamped him, for his own and for all time, as the ideal of unreflecting republicanism and the favourite of all who make it their hobby, he was yet the only man who honourably and courageously defended in the last struggle the great system doorned to destruction. Just because the shrewdest he feels itself inwardly annihilated before the simple truth, and because all the dignity and glory of human nature ultimately depend not on shrewdness but on honesty, Cato has played a greater part in history than many men far superior to him in intellect It only elevates the deep and tragic significance of his death that he was hunself a fool, in truth it is just because Dan Quixote is a fool that he is a tragic figure. It is an affecting fact, that on that world-stage, on which so many great and wise men had moved and acted, the fool was destined to give the epilogue He too died not in vain It was a fearfully striking protest of the republic against the monarchy, that the larrepublican went as the first monarch came-a protest which tore asunder like gossamer all that so-called constitutional character with which Caesar invested his monarchy, and exposed in all its hypocritical falsehood the shibboleth of the reconcilation of all parties, under the aegis of which despotism grew up. unrelenting warfare which the ghost of the legitimate republic waged for centuries, from Cassius and Brutus down to Thrasea and Tacitus, nay even far later, against the Caesarian monarchy -a warfare of plots and of literature-was the legacy which the dying Cato bequeathed to his enemies. This republican opposition borrowed from Cato its whole attitude-stately, transcendental in its rhetoric, pretentiously rigid, hopeless, and faithful to death; and accordingly it began even immediately after his death to revere as a saint the man who in his lifetime was not unfrequently its laughingstock and its scandal. But the greatest of these marks of respect was the involuntary homage which Caesar rendered to him, when he made an exception to the contemptuous clemency with which he was wont to treat his opponents, Pompeians as well as republicans, in the case of Cato alone, and pursued him even beyond the grave with that energetic hatred which practical statesmen are wont to feel towards antagonists who oppose them from an ideal point of view equally dangerous and impracticable.

CHAP. X. Brundisium, Ilerda, Pharsalus 423

CHAPTER XI

THE OLD REPUBLIC AND THE NEW MONARCHY

THE new monarch of Rome, the first ruler of the whole domain of Romano-Hellenic civilisation, Gaius Julius Caesar, was in his fifty-sixth year (born 12th July $537) when the battle of Thapsus, the last link in a long chain of momentous victories, at end the decision of the future of the world in his hands all mut to the proof

wed

last produced by the ancient toric, and it until its sun had set on in the track that he marked out for it until its sun had set Sprung from one of the oldest noble families of Latium-which traced hack its lineage to the heroes of the Iliad and the kings of Rome, and in fact to the Venus-Aphrodite common to both nations—he spent the years of his boyhood and early manhood as the genteel youth of that epoch were wont to spend them He had tasted the sweetness as well as the hitterness of the cup of fashionable life, had recited and declaimed, had practised literature and made verses in his idle hours, had prosecuted love-intrigues of every sort, and got hunself initiated into all the mysteries of shaving, curls, and ruffles pertaining to the toilette-wisdom of the day, as well as into the far more my sterious art of always borrowing and never paying. But the flexible steel of that nature was proof against even these dissipated and flighty courses, Caesar retained both his bodily vigour and his elasticity of mind and heart ununpaired In fencing and in riding he was a match for any of his soldiers, and at Alexandria his swimming saved his life, the incredible rapidity of his journeys, which usually for the sake of gaining time were performed by night—a thorough contrast to the procession like slowness with which Pompeus moved from one place to another -was the astonishment of his contemporaries and not the least The mind was like the body. His remarkable power of intuition revealed itself in the precusor and practicability of all his arrangements, even where he gave orders without having seen with his own eyes. His memory was matchless, and it was easy for him to carry on several occupations simultaneously with equal self-possession. Although a gentleman, a man of genius, and a monarch, he had still a heart. So long as he lived, he cherished the purest veneration for his worthy mother Aurelia (his father having died early); to his wives and above all to his daughter Julia he devoted an honourable affection, which was not without reflex influence even on political affairs. With the ablest and most excellent men of his time, of high and of humble rank, he maintained noble relations of mutual fidelity, with each after his kind. As he himself never abandoned any of his partisans after the pusillanimous and unfeeling manner of Pompeius, but adhered to his friends—and that not merely from calculation—through good and bad times without wavering, several of these, such as Aulus Hirtius and Gaius Matius, gave, even after his death, noble testimonies of their attachment to him.

If in a nature so harmoniously organised there is any one trait to be singled out as characteristic, it is this-that he stood aloof from all ideology and everything fanciful. As a matter of course Caesar was a man of passion, for without passion there is no genius; but his passion was never stronger than he could control. He had had his season of youth, and song, love, and wine had taken joyous possession of his mind; but with him they did not penetrate to the inmost core of his nature. Literature occupied him long and earnestly; but, while Alexander could not sleep for thinking of the Homeric Achilles. Caesar in his sleepless hours mused on the inflections of the Latin nouns and verbs. He made verses, as everybody then did, but they were weak; on the other hand he was interested in subjects of astronomy and natural science. While wine was and continued to be with Alexander the destroyer of care, the temperate Roman, after the revels of his youth were over, avoided it entirely. Around him, as around all those whom the full lustre of woman's love has dazzled in youth, fainter gleams of it continued imperishably to linger; even in later years he had his love-adventures and successes with women, and he retained a certain foppishness in his outward appearance, or, to speak more correctly, a pleasing consciousness of his own manly beauty. He carefully covered the baldness which he keenly felt with the laurel chaplet that he wore in public in his later years, and he would doubtless have surrendered some of his victories, if he could thereby have brought back his youthful locks. But, however much even when monarch he enjoyed the society of women, he only amused himself with them, and allowed them no manner of influence over him, even his much censured relation to queen Cleopatra was only con trived to mask a weak point in his political position (p. 401).

Caesar was thoroughly a realist and a man of sense, and whatever he undertook and achieved was pervaded and guided by the cool sobriety which constitutes the most marked peculi arity of his genius To this he owed the power of living ener getically in the present, undisturbed either by recollection or by expectation, to this he owed the capacity of acting at any moment with collected vigour, and applying his whole genius even to the smallest and most incidental enterprise, to this he owed the many sided power with which he grasped and mastered whatever understanding can comprehend and will can compel to this he owed the self possessed case with which he arranged his periods as well as projected his campaigns, to this he owed the "marvellous serenity' which remained steadily with him through good and evil days, to this he owed the complete independence, which admitted of no control by favourite or by mistress, or even by friend It resulted, moreover, from this clearness of judgment that Caesar never formed to himself illusions regarding the power of fate and the ability of min in his case the friendly veil was lifted up, which conceals from man the inadequacy of his working. However prudently he planned and contemplated all possibilities, the feeling was never absent from his heart that in all things fortune, that is to say accident, must bestow success, and with this may be connected the circumstance that he so often played a desperate game with

y, and in particular again and again hazarded his person with daring indifference. As indeed occasionally men of pre dominant sagacity betake themselves to a pure gume of hazard so there was in Caesar's rationalism a point at which it came

ith mysticism

it fail to produce a statesman Caesar was a statesman in the deepest sense of the term, and his aim was the highest which man is allowed to propose to himself—the political, militari, intellectual, and moral regeneration of his own deeply decayed nation, and of the still more deeply decayed Hellense nation intimately akin to his own. The hard school of thart, years' experience changed his views as to the means be which this aim was to be reached, his nim itself remained the same in the times of his hopeless humiliation and of his unlimit of pleritude of hower, in the times when as demagogue and conspirator be stole towards it by paths of darkness, and in those when, as joint possessor of the supreme power and then as monarch, he worked at his task in the full light of day before the eyes of the world. All the measures of a permanent king that proceeded from him at the most various times assume their appropriate places in the great building-plan. We cannot therefore properly speak of isolated achievements of Caesar; he did nothing isolated. With justice men commend Caesar the orator for his masculine eloquence, which, scorning all the arts of the advocate, like a clear flame at once enlightened and warmed. With justice men admire in Caesar the author the inimitable simplicity of the composition, the unique purity and beauty of the language. With justice the greatest masters of war of all times have praised Caesar the general, who, in a singular degree disregarding routine and tradition, knew always how to find out the mode of warfare by which in the given case the enemy was conquered, and which was consequently in the given case the right one; who with the certainty of divination found the proper means for every end; who after defeat stood ready for battle like William of Orange, and ended the campaign invariably with victory; who managed that element of warfare, the treatment of which serves to distinguish military genius from the mere ordinary ability of an officer—the rapid movement of masses—with unsurpassed perfection and found the guarantee of victory not in the massiveness of his forces but in the celerity of their movements, not in long preparation but in rapid and bold action even with inadequate means. But all these were with Caesar mere secondary matters; he was no doubt a great orator, author, and general, but he became each of these merely because he was a consummate statesman. The soldier more especially played in him altogether an accessory part, and it is one of the principal peculiarities by which he is distinguished from Alexander, Hannibal, and Napoleon, that he began his political activity not as an officer, but as a demagogue. According to his original plan he had purposed to reach his object, like Pericles and Gaius Gracchus, without force of arms, and throughout eighteen years he had as leader of the popular party moved exclusively amid political plans and intrigues—until, reluctantly convinced of the necessity for a military support, he, when already forty years of age, headed an army. It was natural that he should even afterwards remain still more statesman than general-just like Cromwell, who also transformed himself from a leader of opposition into a military chief and democratic king, and who

in general, little as the Puritan hero seems to resemble the dissolute Roman, is yet in his development as well as in the objects which he aimed at and the results which he achieved of all statesmen perhaps the most akm to Caesar Even in his mode of warfare this improvised generalship may still be recognised, the enterprises of Napoleon against Egypt and against England do not more clearly exhibit the artillery heutenant who had risen by service to command than the similar enterprises of Caesar exhibit the demagogue metamor phosed into a general A regularly trained officer would hardly have been prepared, through political considerations of a not altogether stringent nature, to set aside the best founded military scruples in the way in which Caesar did on several occasions, most strikingly in the case of his landing in Epirus Several of his acts are therefore censurable in a military point of view, but what the general loses, the statesman gains 'The task of the statesman is universal in its nature like Caesar's genius, if he undertook things the most varied and most remote one from another, they had all without exception a bearing on the one great object to which with infinite fidelity and consis tency he devoted himself, and of the manifold aspects and directions of his great activity he never preferred one to another Although a master of the art of war, he yet from statesmanly considerations did his utmost to avert the civil strife and, when it nevertheless began, to keep his laurels from the stain of blood Although the founder of a military monarchy, he yet, with an energy unexampled in history, allowed no hierarchy of marshals or government of practorians to come into existence If he had a preference for any one form of services rendered to the state, it was for the sciences and arts of peace rather than for those of war

s action as a statesman the conditions for this vere united in Caesa

A thorough realist, he never allowed the images of the past or venerable tradition to disturb him, with him nothing was of value in politics but the living present and the law of reason, just as in grammar he set eside historical and antiquiarian research and recognised nothing but on the one hand the living suise logurals and on the other hand the rule of symmetry. A born ruler, he governed the minds of men as the wind drives the clouds, and compelled the most heterogeneous natures to place themselves at his service—the smooth citizen and the rough subaltern, the noble matrons of Rome and the fair princesses of Egypt and Mauretania, the brilliant cavalry-officer and the calculating banker. His talent for organisation was marvellous; no statesman has ever compelled alliances, no general has ever collected an army out of unyielding and refractory elements with such decision, and kept them together with such firmness, as Caesar displayed in constraining and upholding his coalitions and his legions; never did regent judge his instruments and assign each to the place appropriate for him with so acute an eye.

He was monarch; but he never played the king. Even when absolute lord of Rome, he retained the deportment of the party-leader; perfectly pliant and smooth, easy and charming in conversation, complaisant towards every one, it seemed as if he wished to be nothing but the first among his peers. Caesar entirely avoided the blunder of so many men otherwise on an equality with him, who have carried into politics the tone of military command; however much occasion his disagreeable relations with the senate gave for it, he never resorted to outrages such as that of the eighteenth Brumaire. Caesar was monarch; but he was never seized with the giddiness of the tyrant. He is perhaps the only one among the mighty men of the earth, who in great matters and little never acted according to inclination or caprice, but always without exception according to his duty as ruler, and who, when he looked back on his life, found doubtless erroneous calculations to deplore, but no false step of passion to regret. There is nothing in the history of Caesar's life, which even on a small scale 1 can be compared with those poetico-sensual ebullitions—such as the murder of Kleitos or the burning of Persepolis—which the history of his great predecessor in the East records. He is, in fine, perhaps the only one of those mighty men who have preserved to the end of his career the statesman's tact of discriminating between the possible and the impossible, and has not broken down in the task which for nobly gifted natures is the most difficult of allthe task of recognising, when on the pinnacle of success, its natural limits. What was possible he performed, and never left the possible good undone for the sake of the impossible better, never disdained at least to mitigate by palliatives evils that were incurable But where he recognised that fate had spoken, he always obeyed Alexander on the Hyphasis, Napoleon at Moscow, tuned back because they were compelled to do so, and were indignant at destiny for bestowing even on its favourites merely limited successes Caesar turned back voluntarily on the Thames and on the Rhine, and at the Danube and the Euphrates thought not of unbounded plans of world conquest, but merely of carrying into effect a well-considered regulation of the frontiers

¹ The affair with Laberius, told in the well-known prologue, has been quoted as an instance of Caesar's tyrannical caprices, but those who have done so have thoroughly misunderstood the irony of the situation as well as of the poet; to say nothing of the naīvete of lamenting as a martyr the poet who readily pockets his honorarium.

Such was this unique man, whom it seems so easy and yet is so infinitely difficult to describe. His whole nature is trans parent clearness, and tradition preserves more copious and more vivid information regarding him than regarding any of his peers in the ancient world. Of such a personage our conceptions may well vary in point of shallowness or depth, but they cannot be, strictly speaking, different, to every not utterly perverted inquirer the grand figure has exhibited the same essential features, and yet no one has succeeded in reproducing it to the life. The secret lies in its perfection. In his character as a man as well as in his place in history, Caerar occupies a position where the great contrasts of existence meet and balance each other. Of the mightiest creative power and yet at the same time of the most penetrating judgment, no longer a youth and not yet an old man, of the highest energy of will and the highest capacity of execution, filled with republican ideals and at the

of culture—Caesar was the entire and perfect man Accordingly we miss in him more than in any other historical personage what are called characteristic features, which are in reality nothing else than deviations from the natural course of human development. What in Caesar passes for such at the first superficial glance is, when more closely observed, seen to be the peculiantly not of the individual, but of the epoch of culture or of the nation, his youthful adventures, for instance, were common to him with all his more grifted contemporaries of the position, his upspectical but strongly logical temperament was the temperament of Romans in general. It formed part also of Caesar's full humanity that he was in the highest degree of the country of the

was a perfect man just because he more than any other placed himself amidst the currents of his time, and because he more than any other possessed the essential peculiarity of the Roman nation-practical aptitude as a citizen-in perfection: for his Hellenism in fact was only the Hellenism which had been long intimately blended with the Italian nationality. But in this very circumstance lies the difficulty, we may perhaps say the impossibility, of depicting Caesar to the life. As the artist can paint everything save only consummate beauty, so the historian, when once in a thousand years he encounters the perfect, can only be silent regarding it. For normality admits doubtless of being expressed, but it gives us only the negative notion of the absence of defect; the secret of nature, whereby in her most finished manifestations normality and individuality are combined, is beyond expression. Nothing is left for us but to deem those fortunate who beheld this perfection, and to gain some faint conception of it from the reflected lustre which rests imperishably on the works that were the creation of this great nature. These also, it is true, bear the stamp of the time. The Roman hero himself stood by the side of his youthful Greek predecessor not merely as an equal, but as a superior; but the world had meanwhile become old and its youthful lustre had faded. The action of Caesar was no longer, like that of Alexander, a joyous marching onward towards a goal indefinitely remote; he built on, and out of, ruins, and was content to establish himself as tolerably and as securely as possible within the ample but yet definite bounds once assigned to him. With reason therefore the delicate poetic tact of the nations has not troubled itself about the unpoetical Roman, and has invested the son of Philip alone with all the golden lustre of poetry, with all the rainbow hues of legend. But with equal reason the political life of nations has during thousands of years again and again reverted to the lines which Caesar drew; and the fact, that the peoples to whom the world belongs still at the present day designate the highest of their monarchs by his name, conveys a warning deeply significant and, unhappily, fraught with shame.

If the old, in every respect vicious, state of things was to be successfully got rid of and the commonwealth was to be renovated, it was necessary first of all that the country should be practically tranquillised and that the ground should be cleared from the rubbish with which since the recent catastrophe it was everywhere strewed. In this work Caesar set out from the principle of the reconciliation of the hitherto subsisting parties or, to put it more correctly-for where the antagonistic principles are irreconcilable, we cannot speak of real reconciliation-from the principle that the arena, on which the nobility and the populace had hitherto contended with each other, was to be abandoned by both parties, and that both were to meet together on the ground of the new monarchical constitution. First of all therefore all the older quarrels of the republican past were regarded as done away for ever and irrevocably. While Caesar gave orders that the statues of Sulla which had been thrown down by the mob of the capital on the news of the battle of Pharsalus should be re-erected, and thus recognised the fact that it became history alone to sit in judgment on that great man, he at the same time cancelled the last remaining effects of Sulla's exceptional laws, recalled from exile those who had been banished in the times of the Cinnan and Sertorian troubles, and restored to the children of those outlawed by Sulla their forfeited privilege of eligibility to office. In like manner all those were restored, who in the preliminary still under attainder; and Milo, the most during conductiers of the senatorial party, was excluded from the general pardon. Far more difficult than the settlement of these questions, which already belonged substantially to the past was the treatment of the parties confronting each other at the moment-on the one hand Caesar's own democratic adherents, on the other hand the overthrown aristocracy. That the former should be, if possible, still less satisfied than the latter with Caesar's conduct after the victory and with his summons to abandon the old standing-ground of party, was to be expected. Caesar himself desired doubtless on the whole the same issue which Gains Gracchus had contemplated; but the designs of the Caesarians were no longer those of the Gracchans. The Roman popular party had been driven onward in gradual progression from reform to revolution, from revolution to anarchy, from anarchy to a war against property; they celebrated among themselves the memory of the reign of terror and now adorned the tomb of Catilina, as formerly that of the Gracchi, with flowers and garlands; they had placed themselves under Caesar's banner, because they expected him to do for them what Catilina had not been able to accomplish. But as it speedily became plain that Caesar was very far from intending to be the executor of Catilina, and that the utmost which debtors might expect from him was some alleviations of payment and modifications of procedure, indignation found loud vent in the inquiry, For whom then had the popular party conquered, if not for the people? and the rabble of this description, high and low, out of pure chagrin at the miscarriage of their politico-economic Saturnalia began first to coquet with the Pompeians, and then even during Caesar's absence of nearly two years from Italy (January \( \frac{1}{4} \frac{1}{4} \), \( \frac{1}{4} \) to instigate there a second civil war within the first.

The practor Marcus Caelius Rufus, a good aristocrat and bad-payer of debts, of some talent and much culture, as a vehement and fluent orator hitherto in the senate and in the Forum one of the most zealous champions for Caesar, proposed to the people—without being instructed from any higher quarter to do so—a law which granted to debtors a respite of six years free of interest, and then, when he was opposed in this step, proposed a second law which even cancelled all claims from loans and current house rents; whereupon the Caesarian senate deposed him from his office. It was just on the eve of the battle of Pharsalus, and the balance in the great contest seemed to incline to the side of the Pompeians; Rufus entered into communication with the old senatorian band-leader Milo, and the two contrived a counter-revolution, which inscribed on its banner partly the republican constitution, partly the cancelling of creditors' claims and the manumission of slaves. his place of exile Massilia, and called the Pompeians and the slave-herdsmen to arms in the region of Thurii; Rufus made arrangements to seize the town of Capua by armed slaves. But the latter plan was detected before its execution and frustrated by the Capuan militia; Quintus Pedius, who advanced with a legion into the territory of Thurii, scattered the band making havoc there; and the fall of the two leaders put an end to the scandal  $(\frac{7.0.6}{3.8})$ .

Nevertheless there was found in the following year  $({}^{7}_{4}{}^{07}_{7})$  a second fool, the tribune of the people, Publius Dolabella, who, equally insolvent but far from being equally gifted with his predecessor, introduced afresh his law as to creditors' claims and house rents, and with his colleague Lucius Trebellius began on that point once more—it was the last time—the demagogic

434 war, there were serious frays between the armed bands on both sides and various street riots, till the commandant of Italy Marcus Antonius ordered the military to interfere, and soon farcus Antonius ordered the minitary to montely and

ance, that he tolerated Donas -some time even received him again into favour Against a rabble of this sort, who are not intent on any political question at all, but solely on a war against property—as against gargs of banditti—the mere existence of a strong government is sufficient, and Caesar was too great and too considerate to busy hirnself with the apprehensions which the Italian alarmists felt regarding the communists of that day, and thereby unduly to procure a false popularity for his monarchy

While Caesar thus might leave, and actually left, the late democratic party to the process of decomposition which had already in its case advanced almost to the utmost limit, he had on the other hand, with reference to the former ansto-cratic party possessing a far greater vitality, to pave the way for, and mittate, its dissolution-which time alone could accomplish—by a proper combination of repression and con chiation Among minor measures, Caesar, even from a natural sense of propriety, avoided exasperating the fallen party by empty sarcasm, he did not triumph over his conquered fellow burgesses, 1 he mentioned Pompeius often and always with respect, and caused his statue overthrown by the people to be re erected at the senate-bouse, when the latter was restored, in its earlier distinguished place. To political prosecutions after the victory Caesar assigned the narrowest possible limits No investigation was instituted into the various communica tions which the constitutional party had held with nominal Caesarians, Caesar threw the piles of papers found in the enemy's head quarters at Pharsalus and Thapsus into the fire unread, and spared himself and the country from political processes against individuals suspected of high treason Further, all the common soldiers who had followed their Roman or provincial officers into the contest against Caesar came of with impunity The sole exception made was in the case of those Roman burgesses, who bad taken service in the army of the Numidian king Juba; their property was confiscated by way of penalty for their treason. Even to the officers of the conquered party Caesar had granted unlimited pardon up to the close of the Spanish campaign of  $\frac{7.05}{4.9}$ ; but he became convinced that in this he had gone too far, and that the removal at least of the leaders among them was inevitable. The rule by which he was thenceforth guided was, that every one who after the capitulation of Ilerda had served as an officer in the enemy's army or had sat in the opposition-senate, if he survived the close of the struggle, forfeited his property and his political rights, and was banished from Italy for life; if he did not survive the close of the struggle, his property at least fell to the state: but any one of these, who had formerly accepted pardon from Caesar and was once more found in the ranks of the enemy, in that case forfeited his life. These rules were however materially modified in the execution. The sentence of death was actually executed only against a very few of the numerous backsliders. In the confiscation of the property of the fallen not only were the debts attaching to the several portions of the estate as well as the claims of the widows for their dowries paid off, as was reasonable, but a portion of the paternal estate was left also to the children of the deceased. Lastly not a few of those who, in consequence of those rules were liable to punishment and confiscation of property, were at once pardoned entirely or got off with fines, like the African capitalists who were impressed as members of the senate of Utica. And even the others almost without exception got their freedom and property restored to them, if they could only prevail on themselves to petition Caesar to that effect; on several who declined to do so, such as the consular Marcus Marcellus, pardon was even conferred unasked, and ultimately in  $\frac{710}{44}$  a general amnesty was issued for all who were still unrecalled.

• The triumph after the battle of Munda subsequently to be mentioned probably had reference only to the Lusitanians who served in great numbers in the conquered army

The republican opposition submitted to be pardoned; but it was not reconciled. Discontent with the new order of things and exasperation against the unwonted ruler were general. For open political resistance there was indeed no farther opportunity—it was hardly worth taking into account, that some oppositional tribunes on occasion of the question of title acquired for themselves the republican crown of martyrdom by a demonstrative intervention against those who had called Caesar king—but republicanism found expression all the more decidedly as an opposition of opinion, and in secret agitation and plotting. Not a hand stirred when the Imperator appeared in p

This settlement of the commonwealth was acceptable to no party, and had to be imposed on his associates no less than on his opponents Caesar's own position was now in a certain sense more imperilled than before the victory, but what he lost, the state gained By annihilating the parties and not simply sparing the partisans but allowing every man of talent or even merely of good descent to attain to office irrespective of his political past, he gained for his great building all the work ing power extant in the state, and not only so, but the voluntary or compulsory participation of men of all parties in the same work led the nation also over imperceptibly to the newly prepared ground. The fact that this reconciliation of the parties was for the moment only external and that they were for the present much less agreed in adherence to the new state of things than in haired against Caesar, did not mislead him, he knew well that antagonisms lose their keenness when brought into such outward union, and that only in this way can the statesman anticipate the work of time, which alone is able finally to heal such a strife by laying the old generation in the grave Still less did he inquire who hated him or meditated bis assassination Like every genume statesman he served not the people for reward-not even for the reward of their lovebut sacrificed the favour of his contemporaries for the blessing of posterity, and above all for the permission to save and renew his nation

In attempting to give a detailed account of the mode in hich the transition was effected from the old to the new state of things, we must first of all recollect that Caesar came not to begin, but to complete The plan of a new polity suited to the times, long ago projected by Gams Gracchus, had been maintained by his adherents and successors with more or less of spirit and success but without wavering Caesar, from the outset and as it were by hereditary right the head of the popular party, had for thurty years borne aloft its banner without ever changing or even so much as concealing his colours, he remained democrat even when monarch As he accepted without limits tion, apart of course from the preposterous projects of Catilina and Clodius, the heritage of his party, as he displayed the bitterest, even personal, hatred to the aristocracy and the genume aristocrats, and as he retained unchanged the essential ideas of Roman democracy viz alleviation of the burdens of debtors, transmarine colonisation, gradual equalisation of the differences of rights among the classes belonging to the state, emancipation of the executive power from the senate: his monarchy was so little at variance with democracy, that democracy on the contrary only attained its completion and fulfilment by means of that monarchy. For his monarchy was not the Oriental despotism of divine right, but a monarchy such as Gaius Gracchus wished to found, such as Pericles and Cromwell founded—the representation of the nation by the man in whom it puts supreme and unlimited confidence. The ideas, which lay at the foundation of Caesar's work, were so far not strictly new; but to him belongs their realisation, which after all is everywhere the main matter; and to him pertains the grandeur of execution, which would probably have surprised the brilliant projector himself if he could have seen it, and which has impressed, and will always impress, every one to whom it has been presented in the living reality or in the mirror of history -to whatever historical epoch or whatever shade of politics he may belong—according to the measures of his ability to comprehend human and historical greatness, with deep and ever-deepening admiration.

At this point however it is proper expressly once for all to postulate what the historian everywhere tacitly presumes, and to protest against the custom—common to simplicity and perfidy—of using historical praise and historical censure, dissociated from the given circumstances, as phrases of general application, and in the present case of construing our judgment respecting Caesar into a judgment respecting what is called Caesarianism. It is true that the history of past centuries ought to be the instructress of the present; but not in the vulgar sense, as if one could simply by turning over the leaves discover the conjunctures of the present in the records of the past, and collect from these the symptoms for a political diagnosis and the specifics for a prescription; it is instructive only so far as the observation of earlier forms of culture reveals the organic conditions of civilisation generally—the fundamental forces everywhere alike, and the manner of their combination everywhere different-and leads and encourages men, not to unreflecting imitation, but to independent reproduction. In this sense the history of Caesar and of Roman Imperialism, with all the unsurpassed greatness of the master-worker, with all the historical necessity of the work, is in truth a more bitter censure of modern autocracy than could be written by the hand of man. According to the same law of nature, in virtue of which the smallest organism infinitely surpasses the most artistic the designation of the month in which he was born by the name which it still bears of Julius, and other manifestations of the foolish tendency towards a courtly tone, which ultimately passed into the silliest adoration. Evidently an attempt was thus made—apparently by way of compromise between the new courtly devotion and the republican aversion to call the monarchy by its right name-to analyse the absolute authority of the monarch into its individual constituent elements, which in truth was as superfluous as it was logically mistaken, for absolute power by virtue of its very nature withdraws itself from all specification. That Caesar himself intended to manu facture his new Lingly power out of this bundle of old and new offices and extraordinary commissions, is a conjecture more naive than ingenious. Men of judgment will not require any proof, either that Caesar intended to engraft on the common wealth his supreme power, not merely for a few years or even as a personal office for an indefinite period or for life somewhat like Sulla's regency, but as an essential and permanent organin other words, as hereditary power-or that he selected for the new institution an appropriate and simple designation, for if it is a political blunder to create names without substantial meaning, it is scarcely a less error to set up the substance of plenary power without a name Only it is not easy to deter mine what was the formal shape chosen by Caesar, partly because in this period of transition the ephemeral and the per manent buildings are not clearly discriminated from each other, partly because the devotion of his clients which already antici pated the nod of their master loaded him with a multitudeoffensive doubtless to himself-of decrees of confidence and laws conferring honours Least of all did the tribunician power furnish an available expression to designate the functions of the consulship, on account of the collegiate character that count of sell be separated from this office. Clessar too laboured evidently to degrade this hitherto supreme magistracy into an empty title, and even when he undertood it, did not ordinately hold it for the whole year, but soon resigned it to subordinate personaces. The dictatorship was precitically the most prominent in point of frequency and definiteness among Caesars many offices evidently because Caesar employed it in the significance which it had of old in the constitutional machinery—as an extra ordinary presidency for surmounting extraordinary crises. On the other hand it was far from recommending itself as the expression of the new monarchy, for it was a magistracy clothed with an exceptional and unpopular character; and it was much too narrow to embrace the new monarchy, if Caesar was invested—as seems to have been the case, and as from his earlier party position could hardly be otherwise—not with the anomalous Sullan, but with (the limit of time excepted) the ordinary republican, dictatorship. The new name of Imperator, on the other hand, appears in every respect the appropriate formal expression to the new monarchy; just because it is new, and no definite outward occasion for its introduction is apparent. The new wine might not be put into old bottles; here is a new name for the new thing, and that name most pregnantly sums up what the democratic party had already expressed in the Gabinian law, only with less precision, as the function of its chief—the concentration of official power (imperium) in the hands of a popular chief independent of the senate. We find on Caesar's coins, especially those of the last period, alongside of the dictatorship the title of Imperator prevailing, and in Caesar's law as to political crimes the monarch seems to have been designated by this name; and, what is quite decisive, the authority of Imperator was given to Caesar not merely for his own person, but also for his bodily or adopted descendants. Accordingly the following times, though not immediately, connected the monarchy with the title of Imperator. To lend to this new office at once a democratic and a religious sanction, Caesar probably intended to associate with it on the one hand the tribunician power, on the other the supreme pontificate, as heirlooms, although it is only in the case of the supreme priesthood that we have express testimony to his having made it hereditary. In point of state-law the new office of Imperator was based on the position which the consuls or proconsuls occupied outside of the pomerium, so that not merely the military command, but the supreme judicial and consequently also the administrative power, were included in it.<sup>1</sup>

The widely spread opinion, which sees in the imperial office of Imperator an essentially military power, namely, the dignity of general of the empire tenable for life, is entirely erroneous, and is not warranted either by the signification of the word or by the view taken by the old authorities. Imperium is the power of command, imperator is the possessor of that power; in these words as in the corresponding Greek terms  $\kappa\rho d\tau os$ ,  $\alpha \dot{\nu} \tau o\kappa \rho \dot{\alpha} \tau \omega p$  so little is there implied a specific military reference, that it is on the contrary the very characteristic of the Roman official power, where it appears purely and completely, to embrace war and process—that is,

Lin whole

The Imperator stood to the onsul in a certain measure as til latter stood to the practor, inasmuch as their authority we similar in kind, but in case of collision, as the practor gate we to the consul, so the consul gave way to the Imperator, whit was also distinctly marked externally by the elevated imperator, whit was also distinctly marked externally by the elevated imperator has placed between the two official seats of the consuls. It authority of the Imperator was qualitatively superior to the consular proconsular, only in so far as the former was not limite as respected time or space but was held for life and heritable and operative also in the capital, as the Imperator could not while the consul could, be checked by colleagues of equal power and as all the restrictions placed in course of time on the original superior official power—especially the obligation to give place to the prosocatio and to respect the advice of the senate—did no apply to the Imperator.

In a word, this new office of Imperator was nothing else that the primitive regal office re-established, for it was those very restrictions—as respected the temporal and local limitation of power, the collegiate arrangement, and the co-operation of the senate or the community that was necessary in certain cases—which distinguished the consul from the king (i 246 st seq.). There is hardly a trait of the new monarchy which was not found in the old the union of the supreme military, judical, and administrative authority in the hands of the prince, a religious presidency over the commonwealth, the right of issuing ordinances with binding power; the reduction of the senate to a council of state; the revival of the patriciate and of the praefecture of the city; the peculiar quasi-hereditary character, for the constitution of Caesar, exactly like those of Cromwell and Napoleon, allowed the monarch to nominate his successor under the forms of adoption. But still more striking than these analogies is the internal similarity of the monarchy of Servius Tullius and the monarchy of Caesar; if those old kings of Rome with all their plenitude of power had yet been sovereigns of a free community and themselves the protectors of the commons against the nobility, Caesar too had not come to destroy liberty but to fulfil it, and primarily to break the intolerable yoke of the aristocracy. Nor need it surprise us that Caesar, anything but a political antiquary, went back five hundred years to find the model for a new state; for, seeing that the supreme magistracy of the Roman commonwealth had remained at all times a royalty restricted by a number of special laws, the idea of the regal office itself had by no means become obsolete. At very various periods and from very different sides -in the republican dictatorship, in the decemviral power, in the Sullan regency—there had been even during the republic a practical recurrence to it; indeed by a certain logical necessity, whenever an exceptional power seemed to be needed, the unlimited imperium, which was simply nothing else than the regal power, came into play in contradistinction to the usual limited imperium.

Lastly, outward considerations also recommended this recurrence to the former royalty. Mankind have infinite difficulty in reaching new creations, and therefore cherish the once developed forms as sacred heirlooms. Accordingly Caesar very judiciously connected himself with Servius Tullius, in the same way as subsequently Charlemagne connected himself with Caesar, and Napoleon attempted at least to connect himself with Charlemagne. He did so, not in a circuitous way and secretly, but, as well as his successors, in the most open manner possible; it was indeed the very object of this connection to find a clear, national and popular form of expression for the new state. From ancient times there stood on the Capitol the statues of those seven kings, whom the conventional history of Rome was wont to bring on the stage; Caesar ordered his own to be erected beside them as the eighth. He appeared publicly in the costume of the old kings of Alba. In his new law as to political offenders the principal variation from that of Sulla was, that there was placed alongside of the national community, and on a level with it, the Imperator as the living and personal expression of the people. In the formula used for political caths there was added to the Jovis and the Penates of the Roman people the Genius of the Imperator. The outward badge of monarchy was, according to the view universally diffused in antiquity, the image of the monarch on the coins; from the year 24 the head of Caesar to the view universally diffused in antiquity, the image of the monarch on the coins; from the year 24° the head of Caesar appears on those of the Roman state. There could accordingly be no complaint at least on the score that Caesar left the public in the dark as to his view of his position; as distinctly and as formally as possible he came forward not merely as monarch, but as very king of Rome. is possible even, although not exactly probable, and at any rate of subordinate importance, that he had it in view to designate his official power not with the new name of Imperator, but directly with the old one of king.2 Even in his lifetime many of his enemies as of his friends were of opinion that he intended to have himself expressly nominated king of Rome; several indeed of his most vehement adherents suggested to him in different ways and nt different times that he should assume the crown; most strikingly of all, Marcus Antonius, when he as consul offered the diadem to Caesar before all the people (15th February 119). But Caesar rejected these proposals without exception at once. If he at the same time took steps against those who made use of these incidents to stir republican opposition, it hy no means follows from this that he was not in earnes*

On this question there may be difference of opinion; the hypothesis however that it was Caesar's intention to rule the Romani as Imperator to the control of the caesar's intention to rule the Romania as Imperator to the caesar's intention to rule the Romania as Imperator to the caesar's intention to rule the Romania as Imperator to the caesar's intention to the caesar's intention with his rejection; and as little has proof been adduced that these invitations took place at his bidding, with the view of preparing the multitude for the unwonted spectacle of the Roman diadem. It may have been the uncalled-for zeal of vehement adherents alone that occasioned these incidents; it may be also, that Caesar merely permitted or even suggested the scene with Antonius, in order to put an end in as marked a manner as possible to the inconvenient gossip by a declinature made before the eyes of the burgesses and inserted by supreme command even in the calendar of the state. The probability is that Caesar, who appreciated alike the value of a convenient formal designation and the antipathies of the multitude which fasten more on the names than on the essence of things, was resolved to avoid the name of king as tainted with an ancient curse and as more familiar to the Romans of his time when applied to the despots of the East than to their own Numa and Servius, and to appropriate the substance of royalty under the title of Imperator.

But, whatever may have been the style and title, the sovereign ruler was there, and accordingly the court established itself at once with all its due accompaniments of pomp, insipidity, and emptiness. Caesar appeared in public not in the robe of the consuls which was bordered with purple stripes, but in the robe wholly of purple which was reckoned in antiquity as the proper regal attire, and received, seated on his golden chair and without rising from it, the solemn procession of the senate. The festivals in his honour commemorative of birthday, of victories, and of vows, filled the calendar. When Caesar came to the capital, his principal servants marched forth in troops to great distances so as to meet and escort him. To be near to him began to be of such importance, that the rents rose in the quarter of the city where he lived. Personal interviews with him were rendered so difficult by the multitude of individuals soliciting audience, that Caesar found himself compelled in many cases to communicate even with his intimate friends in writing, and that persons even of the highest rank had to wait for hours in the ante-chamber. People felt, more clearly than was agreeable to Caesar himself, that they no longer approached a fellow-citizen. There arose a monarchical aristocracy, which was in a remarkable manner at once new and old, and which had sprung out of the idea of casting into the shade the aristocracy of the oligarchy by that of royalty, the nobility by the patriciate. The patrician body still subsisted, although without essential privileges as an order, in the character of a close aristocratic guild (1 298), but as it could receive no new gentes (1 258) it had dwindled away more and more in the course of centuries, and in the time of Caesar there were not more than fifteen or sixteen patrician gentes still in existence Caesar himself spring from one of them, got the right of creating new patrician gentes conferred on the Imperator by decree of the people, and so established, in contrast to the republican nobility, the new aristocracy of the patriciate, which most happily combined all the requisites of a monarchical aristocracy—the charm of antiquity, entire de pendence on the government, and total insignificance sides the new sovereignty revealed itself

Under a monarch thus practically unlimited there could hardly be room for a constitution at all-still less for a con tinuance of the hitherto existing commonwealth based on the legal co operation of the burgesses, the senate, and the several magnetrates Caesar fully and definitely reverted to the tradition of the regal period, the burgess assembly remained—what it had already been in that period—by the side of and with the king the supreme and ultimate expression of the will of the sovereign people, the senate was brought back to its original destination of giving advice to the ruler when he requested it, and lastly the ruler concentrated in his person anew the whole magisterial authority, so that there existed no independent state official by his side any more than by the side of the kings of the earliest times

In legislation the democratic monarch adhered to the primitive maxim of Roman state law, that the community of the people in concert with the king convoking them had alone the power of organically regulating the commonwealth, and he had his constitutive enactments regularly sanctioned by decree of the The free energy and the authority half moral, half political, which the yea or nay of those old warrior assemblies had carried with it, could not indeed be again instilled into the so-called comitta of this period, the co-operation of the burgesses in legislation, which in the old constitution had been extremely limited but real and living, was in the new practically an un substantial shadow. There was therefore no need of special restrictive measures against the comitia, many years' experience mal sovereign lement in the in so far as they served to retain in principle the sovereignty of the people and to constitute an energetic protest against sultanism.

But at the same time—as is not only obvious of itself, but is also distinctly stated—the other maxim also of the oldest state-law was revived by Caesar himself, and not merely for the first time by his successors; viz., that what the supreme, or rather sole, magistrate commands is unconditionally valid so long as he remains in office, and that, while legislation no doubt belongs only to the king and the burgesses in concert, the royal edict is equivalent to law at least till the demission of its author.

While the democratic king thus conceded to the community of the people at least a formal share in the sovereignty, it was by no means his intention to divide his authority with what had hitherto been the governing body, the college of senators. The senate of Caesar was to be—in a quite different way from the later senate of Augustus—nothing but a supreme council of state, which he made use of for advising with him beforehand as to laws, and for the issuing of the more important administrative ordinances through it, or at least under its name—for cases in fact occurred where decrees of senate were issued, of which none of the senators recited as present at their preparation had any cognisance. There were no materal difficulties of form in reducing the senate to its original deliberative position, which it had overstepped more de facto than de jure; but in this case it was necessary to protect himself from practical resistance, for the Roman senate was as much the headquarters of the opposition to Caesar as the Attic Areopagus was of the opposi-tion to Péricles. Chiefly for this reason the number of senators, which had hitherto amounted at most to six hundred in its normal condition (iii. 339) and had been greatly reduced by the recent crises, was raised by extraordinary supplement to nine hundred; and at the same time, to keep it at least up to this mark, the number of quaestors to be nominated annually, that is of members annually admitted to the senate, was raised from twenty to forty. The extraordinary filling up of the senate was undertaken by the monarch alone. In the case of the ordinary additions he secured to himself a permanent influence through the circumstance, that the electoral colleges were bound by law to give their votes to the first twenty candidates for the quaestorship who were provided with letters of recommendation from the monarch; besides, the crown was at liberty to confer the honorary rights attaching to the quaestorship or to any office superior to it, and consequently a seat in the senate in particular, by way of exception even on individuals not qualified. The selection of the extraordinary members who were added naturally fell in the main on adherents of the new order of things, and introduced, along with equites of respectable standing, various dubious and plebeian personages into the proud corporation-former senators who had been erased from the roll by the censor or in consequence of a judicial sentence, foreigners from Spain and Gaul who had to some extent to learn their Latin in the senate, men lately subaltern officers who had not previously received even the equestrian ring, sons of freedmen or of such as followed dishonourable trades, and other elements of a like kind. The exclusive circles of the nobility, to whom this chaoge in the personal composition of the senate naturally gave the bitterest offence, saw in it an intentional . ... --- i-self. Caesar was not he was as determined he was as determined cil as he was convinced it. They might more correctly have discerned in this processing the intention of the monarch to take away from the senate its former character of an exclusive representation of the olgarchic aristorary, and to make it once more—what it had been in the regal period—a belonging to the taken the period of the per ot necessarily reigner; just 78, 80, 256),

&lt;sup>1</sup> According to the probable estimate formerly assumed (iii. 339), this would yield an average aggregate number of from 1000 to 1200 senators,

as those earliest kings introduced non-Italians into his senate.

While the rule of the nobility was thus set aside and its existence undernmed, and while the senate in its new form was merely a tool of the monarch, autocracy was at the same time most strictly carried out in the administration and government of the state, and the whole executive was concentrated in the hands of the monarch. First of all, the Imperator naturally decided in person every question of any moment. Caesar was displaying throughout an activity which transcends our notions of human powers of working, the reason lies, not in any change that human nature has undergone since that time, but in the change which has taken place since then in the organisation of the household. The Roman house was a machine, in which even the intellectual powers of the slaves and freedmen yielded their produce to the master; a master, who knew how to govern these, worked as it were with countless minds. It was the beau ideal of bureaucratic centralisation; which our counting-house system strives indeed zealously to imitate, but remains as far behind the prototype as the modern power of capital is inferior to the ancient system of slavery. Caesar knew how to profit by this advantage; wherever any post demanded special confidence, we see him filling it up on principle—so far as other considerations at all permit—with his slaves, freedmen, or clients of humble birth. His works as a whole show what an organising genius like his could accomplish with such an instrument; but to the question, how the details of these marvellous feats were achieved, we have no adequate answer. Bureaucracy resembles a manufactory also in this respect, that the work done does not appear as that of the individuals who have worked at it, but as that of the manufactory which stamps it. This much only is quite clear, that Caesar had no helper at all in his work who exerted a personal influence over it or was even so much as initiated into the whole plan; he was not only the sole master-workman. but he worked also without skilled associates, merely with common labourers.

With respect to details as a matter of course in strictly political affairs Caesar avoided, so far as was at all possible, any delegation of his functions. Where it was inevitable, as especially when during his frequent absence from Rome he had need of a higher organ there, the person destined for this purpose was, significantly enough, not the legal deputy of the monarch, the prefect of the city, but a confidant without officially recognised jurisdiction, usually Caesar's banker, the cunning and pliant Phoenician merchant Lucius Cornelius Balbus from Gades. In administration Caesar was above all careful to resume the keys of the state-chest—which the senate had appropriated to itself after the fall of the regal power, and by means of which it had possessed itself of the government—and to entrust them only to those servants who with their persons were absolutely and exclusively devoted to him. In respect of ownership indeed the private means of the monarch remained, of course, strictly separate from the property of the state, but Caesar took in hand the administration of the whole financial and monetary system of the state, and conducted it entirely in the way in which he and the Roman grandees generally were won't to manage the administration of their own means and substance. For the future the levying of the provincial revenues and in the main also the management of the comage were entrusted to the slaves and freedmen of the Imperator, and men of the senatorial order were excluded from it—amomentous step, out of which grew in course of time the important class of procurators and the "imperial household"

Of the governorships on the other hand, which, after they had handed their financial business over to the new imperial taxreceivers, were still more than they had formerly been essentially military commands, that of Egypt alone was transferred to the monarch's own retainers The country of the Nile, in a peculiar manner geographically isolated and politically centralised, was better fitted than any other district to break off permanently under an able leader from the central power, as the attempts which had repeatedly been made by hard pressed Italian partychiefs to establish themselves there during the recent crisis sufficiently proved Probably it was simply this consideration that induced Caesar not to declare the land formally a province, but to tolerate the comparatively harmless Lagidae there, and certainly for this reason the legions stationed in Egypt were not entrusted to a man belonging to the senate or in other words to the former government, but this command was, just like the posts of tax receivers, treated as a menial office (p 454) In general however the consideration had weight with Caesar, that the soldiers of Rome should not, like those of Oriental kings, be commanded by lackeys It remained the rule to entrust the more important governorships to those who had been consuls, the less important to those who had been practors, and once more, instead of the five years' interval prescribed by the law of 303 (p 406), the commencement of the governorship was in the ancient fashion directly annexed to the close of the official functions in the city On the other hand the distribution of the provinces among the qualified candidates, which had hitherto rates or by lot, passed to were frequently induced to abdicate before the end of the year and to make room for after-elected consuls (consules suffecti), as, moreover, the number of practors annually nominated was raised from eight to sixteen, and the nomination of half of them was entrusted to the Imperator in the same way as that of the half of the quaestors; and, lastly, as there was reserved to the Imperator the right of nominating, if not titular consuls, at any rate titular practors and titular quaestors: Caesar secured a sufficient number of candidates acceptable to him for filling up the governorships. Their recall remained of course left to the discretion of the regent as well as their nomination; as a rule it was assumed that the consular governor should not remain more than two years, nor the practorian more than one year, in the province.

Lastly, so far as concerns the administration of the city which was his capital and residence, the Imperator evidently intended for a time to entrust this also to magistrates similarly nominated by him. He revived the old city-lieutenancy of the regal period (i. 64); on different occasions he committed during his absence the administration of the capital to one or more such lieutenants nominated by him without consulting the people and for an indefinite period, who united in themselves the functions of all the administrative magistrates and possessed even the right of coining money with their own name, although of course not with their own effigy. In  $\frac{707}{47}$  and in the first nine months of <sup>709</sup><sub>45</sub> there were, moreover, neither praetors nor curule aediles nor quaestors; the consuls too were nominated in the former year only towards its close, and in the latter Caesar was even consul without a colleague. This looks altogether like an attempt to revive completely the old regal authority within the city of Rome, as far as the limits enjoined by the democratic past of the new monarch; in other words, of magistrates additional to the king himself, to allow only the prefect of the city during the king's absence and the tribunes and plebeian aediles appointed for protecting popular freedom to continue in existence, and to abolish the consulship, the censorship, the praetorship, the curule aedileship, and the quaestorship.¹ But Caesar subsequently departed from this; he neither accepted the royal title himself, nor did he cancel those venerable names interwoven with the glorious history of the republic. The consuls, praetors, aediles, tribunes, and quaestors retained

Hence accordingly the cautious turns of expression on the mention of these magistracies in Caesar's laws; cum censor aliusve quis magistratus Romae populi censum aget (L. Jul. mun. l. 144); praetor isve quei Romae iure deicundo praeerit (L. Rubr. often); quaestor urbanus queive aerario praeerit (L. Jul. mun. l. 37 etc.).

454 substantially their previous formal powers, nevertheless their position was totally altered It was the political idea lying at the foundation of the republic that the Roman empire was identified with the city of Rome, and in consistency with it the municipal magistrates of the capital were treated through out as magistrates of the empire In the monarchy of Caesar that view and this consequence of it fell into abeyance, the magistrates of Rome formed thenceforth only the first among the many municipalities of the empire, and the consulship in particular became a purely titular post, which preserved a certain practical importance only in virtue of the reversion of a higher governorship annexed to it The fate, which the Roman community had been wont to prepare for the vanquished, now by means of Caesar hefell itself, its sovereignty over the Roman empire was converted into a hunted communal freedom within the Roman state That at the same time the number of the practors and quaestors was doubled has been already men tioned, the same course was followed with the plebeian aediles, to nbom tho new "com aediles" (aediles Cerrales) nere added to superintend the supplies of the capital The appointment to those offices remained with the community, and was subject to no restriction as respected the consuls, tribunes of the people, and pleberan aediles, we have already adverted to the fact, hat the Imperator reserved a right of proposal binding on the lectors as regards the half of the practors, curule aediles, and luaestors to be annually nominated In general the ancient ind sacred palladia of popular freedom were not touched, which, of course, did not prevent the individual refractory inbune of the people from being senously interfered with and, n fact, deposed and erased from the roll of senators

As the Imperator was thus, for all the more general and more important questions, his own minister, as he controlled the finances by his servants, and the army by his adjutants, as the old republican state magistracies were again converted into municipal magistracies of the city of Rome, and as in addition to all this he acquired the right of himself nominating his successor—the autocracy was sufficiently established In the spiritual hierarchy on the other hand Caesar, although the cod a detailed law respecting this portion of the state

ship to the person of the 7 this, one new stall was created in each of the three supreme colleges, and three new stalls in the fourth college of the banquet-masters. If the Roman state-hierarchy had hitherto served as a support to the ruling oligarchy, it might render precisely the same service to the new monarchy. The conservative religious policy of the senate was transferred to the new kings of Rome; when the strictly conservative Varro published about this time his "Antiquities of Divine Things," the great fundamental repository of Roman state-theology, he could dedicate it to the Pontifex Maximus Caesar. The faint lustre which the worship of Jovis was still able to impart shone round the newly established throne; and the old national faith became in its last stages the instrument of a Caesarian papacy, which, however, was from the outset but hollow and feeble.

In judicial matters, first of all, the old regal jurisdiction was re-established. As the king had originally been judge in criminal and civil causes, without being legally bound in the former to respect an appeal to the prerogative of mercy in the people, or in the latter to commit the decision of the question in dispute to jurymen; so Caesar claimed the right of bringing capital causes as well as private processes for sole and final decision to his own bar, and disposing of them in the event of his presence personally, in the event of his absence by the city-lieutenant. In fact we find him, quite after the manner of the ancient kings, now sitting in judgment publicly in the Forum of the capital on Roman burgesses accused of high treason, now holding a judicial inquiry in his house regarding the client princes accused of the like crime; so that the only privilege, which the Roman burgesses had as compared with the other subjects of the king, seems to have consisted in the publicity of the judicial procedure. But this resuscitated supreme jurisdiction of the kings, although Caesar discharged its duties with impartiality and care, could only from the nature of the case find practical application in exceptional cases.

For the usual procedure in criminal and civil causes the former republican mode of administering justice was substantially retained. Criminal causes were still disposed of as formerly before the different jury-commissions entitled to deal with the several crimes, civil causes partly before the court of inheritance or, as it was commonly called, of the centumviri, partly before the single judices; the superintendence of judicial proceedings was as formerly conducted in the capital chiefly by the praetors, in the provinces by the governors. Political crimes too continued even under the monarchy to be referred to a jury commission, the new ordinance, which Caesar issued respecting them, specified the acts legally punishable with precision and in a liberal spirit which excluded all prosecution of opinions, and it fixed as the penalty not death, but banishment As respects the selection of the jurymen, whom the senatorial party desired to see chosen exclusively from the senate and the strict Gracehans exclusively from the eques trian order, Caesar, faithful to the principle of reconciling the parties, left the matter on the footing of the compromise-law of Cotta (p 90), but with the modification-for which the way was probably prepared by the law of Pompens of (p 298)—that the tribuni acrarii who came from the lower ranks of the people were set aside, so that there was established a rating for jurymen of at least 400 000 sesterces (£4000), and senators and equites now divided the functions of jurymen which had so long been an apple of discord between them

The relations of the regal and the republican jurisdiction were on the whole co-ordinate, so that any cause might be initiated as well before the king's bar as before the competent republican tribunal, the latter of course in the event of collision giving way, if on the other hand the one or the other tribunal had pronounced sentence, the cause was thereby finally disposed of But in another way the new king acquired the power of revising under certain circumstances a judicial sentence The tribune of the people might interfere so as to cancel-like any tother official act-the sentence pronounced by jurymen under , the direction of a magistrate, unless where special exceptional laws excluded the tribunician intercession-which was the case with the jury courts of the centumviri and of the different emminal commissions instituted by recent laws. With the or accordingly, the Imperator might ١, ament of jury

private ue of his

ue of his superne, judicial prerogative order to discussed anew before himself. Thus Caesar established by the side of his regal tribunal of first and sole jurisdiction which was co-ordinate with the former ordinary tribunals, a regal appellate jurisdiction, and thereby originated the legal form of appeal to

&lt;sup>1</sup>These rules certainly cannot be fully proved to have existed anterior to Augustus but as all the elements of this remarkable judicial reform as implied in the powers of the Imperator as arranged by Carsar we may be allowed to refer their origin to him

respects unsound we need scarcely mention, it too suffered from the effects of the party politics mixed up with all things, as for instance in the process of Publius Quinctius (471-673) where the most contradictory decisions were given according as Cinna or Sulla had the ascendancy in Rome, and the advocates, frequently non jurists, produced here also intentionally and unintentionally abundance of confusion But it was implied in the nature of the case, that party mixed itself up with such matters only by way of exception, and that here the quibbles of advocates could not so rapidly or so deeply break up the ideas of right, accordingly the civil pleadings which we possess from this epoch, while not according to our stricter ideas effective compositions for their purpose, are yet of a far less libellous and far more juristic character than the contemporary speeches in cruminal causes If Caesar permitted the curb imposed on the eloquence of advocates by Pompeius (p 305) to remain, or even rendered it more severe, there was at least nothing lost by this, and much was gained, when better selected and better superintended magistrates and jurymen were nominated and the palpable corruption and intimidation of the courts came to an end But the sacred sense of right and the reverence for the law, which it is difficult to destroy in the minds of the multitude, it is still more difficult to reproduce Though the legislator did away with various abuses, he could not heal the root of the evil, and it might be doubted whether time, which cures everything curable, would in this case bring relief

The Roman military system of this period was nearly in the same condition as the Carthagman at the time of Hannibal The governing classes furnished only the officers, the subjects, pleberans and provincials, formed the army The general was finuncially and militarily, almost independent of the central government, and, whether in fortune or misfortune, substantially left to himself and to the resources of his province. Civic and even mitional spirit had a unished from the army, and the espirit de corps was alone left as a bond of inward union. The army

3 ** be an instrument of the commonwealth, in a

disorganised useless rabble, but under a right general it attained a military perfection which the burgess army could never reach The class of officers especially had deeply degenerated. The higher ranks, senators and equites, grew more and more unused point of view it salik unuse.

t, in a military

e leaders into a

enemy, mstances occurred where considerable armies, such as the Macedonian army of Piso in $\frac{q}{2}$ (p 272), were without any proper defeat utterly runed, simply by this misconduct Capable leaders on the other hand, such as Pompeius, Caesar, Gahinius, formed doubtless out of the existing materials able and efficient, and to some extent exemplary, armes, but these armies belonged far more to their general than to the commonwealth. The still more complete decay of the Roman marine—which, moreover, had remained an object of antipathy to the Romans and had never been fully nationalised—scarcely requires to be mentioned. Here too, in all directions, everything that could be runed had been reduced to runu under the objective overtiment.

The reorganisation of the Roman military system by Caesar was substantially limited to the tightening and strengthening of the reins of discipline, which had been relaxed under the negligent and incapable supervision previously subsisting Roman military system seemed to him neither to need nor to be capable of, radical reform, he accepted the elements of the army, just as Hannibal had accepted them The enactment of his municipal ordinance that, in order to the holding of a municipal magistracy or sitting in the municipal council before the thirtieth year, three years service on horseback-that 15, as officer-or six years service on foot should be required, proves indeed that he wished to attract the better classes to the army, but it proves with equal clearness that amidst the ever increasing prevalence of an unwarlike spirit in the nation he himself held it no longer possible to associate the holding of an honorary office with the fulfilment of the time of service un conditionally as hitherto. This very circumstance series to explain why Caesar made no attempt to re-establish the Roman burgess cavalry The levy was better arranged, the time of service was regulated and abridged, otherwise matters remained on the footing that the miantry of the line were raised chefly from the lower orders of the Roman burgesses, the cavalry and the light infantry from the other subjects That nothing was done for the reorganisation of the fleet, is surprising

It was an innovation—hexardous beyond doubt ever an she view of its author—to cavalry furnished by Caesar for the first ti of never fighting with mercenaries, and incorporated in the cavalry hired foreigners, especially Germans Another innovation was the appointment of adjutants of the legion with praetorian powers (legati legionis pro praetore). Hitherto the military tribunes, nominated partly by the burgesses, partly by the governor concerned, had led the legions in such a way that six of them were placed over each legion, and the command alternated among these; a single commandant of the legion was appointed by the general only as a temporary and extraordinary measure. In subsequent times on the other hand those colonels or adjutants of legions appear as a permanent and organic institution, and as nominated no longer by the governor whom they obey, but by the supreme command in Rome; both changes seem referable to Caesar's arrangements connected with the Gabinian law (p. 98). The reason for the introduction of this important intervening step in the military hierarchy must be sought partly in the necessity for a more energetic centralisation of the command, partly in the felt want of able superior officers, partly and chiefly in the design of providing a counterpoise to the governor by associating with him one or more colonels nominated by the Imperator.

The most essential change in the military system consisted in the institution of a permanent military head in the person of the Imperator, who, superseding the previous unmilitary and in every respect incapable governing corporation, united in his hands the whole control of the army, and thus converted it from a direction which for the most part was merely nominal into a real and energetic supreme command. We are not properly informed as to the position which this supreme command occupied towards the special commands hitherto omnipotent in their respective spheres. Probably the analogy of the relation subsisting between the praetor and the consul or the consul and the dictator served generally as a basis, so that, while the governor in his own right retained the supreme military authority in his province, the Imperator was entitled at any moment to take it away from him and assume it for himself or his delegates, and, while the authority of the governor was confined to the province, that of the Imperator, like the regal and the earlier consular authority, extended over the whole empire. Moreover it is extremely probable that now the nomination of the officers, both the military tribunes and the centurions, so far as it had hitherto belonged to the governor, as well as the nomination of the new adjutants of the legion, passed directly into the hands of the Imperator; and in like manner even now the arrangement of the levies, the bestowal of leave of absence, and the more important criminal cases, may have been submitted to the judgment of the commander in chief. With this limitation of the powers of the governors and with the regulated control of the Imperator, there was no great room to apprehend in future either that the armies might be utterly disorganised or that they might be converted into retainers personally, devoted to their respective officers.

With the nomination of a part of the military tribunes by the burgesses (ii. 303) Caesar—in this also a democrat—did not meddle.

But, however decidedly and urgently the circumstances pointed to military monarchy, and however distinctly Caesar took the supreme command exclusively for himself, he was nevertheless not at all inclined to establish his authority by means of, and on, the army No doubt he deemed a standing army necessary for his state, but only because from its geo graphical position it required a comprehensive regulation of the frontiers and permanent frontier garrisons. Partly at extlier periods, partly during the recent civil war, he had worked at the tranquillising of Spain, and had established strong positions for the defence of the frontier in Africa along the great desert, and in the north west of the empire along the line of the Rhine He occupied himself with similar plans for the countries on the Euphrates and on the Danube Above all he designed an expedition against the Parthians, to avenge the day of Carrhae, he had destined three years for this war, and was resolved to settle accounts with these dangerous enemies once for all and not less cautiously than thoroughly. In like manner he had projected the scheme of attacking Boerebistas king of the Getae, who was greatly extending his power on both sides of the Danube (P 273), and of protecting Italy in the north-east bi border districts similar to those which he had created for it in Gaul On the other hand there is no evidence at all that Caesar contemplated like Alexander an indefinite career of victors, it is said indeed that he had intended to march from Partia to the Caspian and from this to the Black Sea and then along its northern shores to the Danube, to annex to the empire all Scythia and Germany as far is the Northern Ocean-which according to the notions of that time was not to very distant from the Mediterranean—and to return home through Gaul, but no authority at all deserving of credit vouches for the existence of these fabulous projects. In the case of a state such conquests, even granting their military practicability, would have been simply blunders far more brilliant and far worse than the Indian expedition of Alexander. Judging both from Caesar's conduct in Britain and Germany and from the conduct of those who became the heirs of his political ideas, it is in a high degree probable that Caesar with Scipio Aemilianus called on the gods not to increase the empire, but to preserve it, and that his schemes of conquest were confined to a settlement of the frontier—measured, it is true, by his own great scale —which should secure the line of the Euphrates and, instead of the very variable and militarily useless boundary of the empire on the north-east, should establish and render defensible the line of the Danube.

But, if it remains a mere probability that Caesar ought not to be designated a world-conqueror in the same sense as Alexander and Napoleon, it is quite certain that his design was not to rest his new monarchy primarily on the support of the army nor generally to place the military authority above the civil, but to incorporate it with, and as far as possible subordinate it to, the civil commonwealth. The invaluable pillars of a military state, those old and far-famed Gallic legions, were honourably dissolved just on account of the incompatibility of their esprit de corps with a civil commonwealth, and their glorious names were only perpetuated in newly-founded civic communities. The soldiers presented by Caesar with allotments of land on their discharge were not, like those of Sulla, settled together—as it were militarily—in colonies of their own, but, especially when they settled in Italy, were isolated as much as possible and scattered throughout the peninsula; except in the case of the portions of the Campanian land that remained at his disposal, where an aggregation of the old soldiers of Caesar could not be avoided. Caesar sought to solve the difficult task of keeping the soldiers of a standing army within the sphere of civil life, partly by retaining the former arrangement which prescribed merely certain years of service, and not a service strictly constant, that is, uninterrupted by any dismissal; partly by the already mentioned shortening of the term of service, which occasioned a speedier change in the personal composition of the army; partly by the regular settlement of the soldiers who had served out their time as agricultural colonists; partly and principally by keeping the army aloof from Italy and generally from the proper seats of the civil and political life of the nation, and directing the soldier to the points, where

according to the opinion of the great king he was alone in his place—to the frontier stations, that he might ward off the extraneous for

The true criterion also of the military state-the development of, and the privileged position assigned to, the corps of guards -is not to be met with in the case of Caesar Although as respects the army on active service the institution of a special body-guard for the general had been already long in existence (in 190), in Caesar's system it fell completely into the background, his practorian cohort seems to have essentially con sisted merely of orderly officers or non military attendants, and never to have been a proper select corps, consequently never an object of jealousy to the troops of the line While Caesar thus as general practically dropped the body-guard, he still less as king tolerated a guard round his person. Although constantly beset by lurking assassins and well aware of it, he vet rejected the proposal of the senate to institute a select guard, dismissed, as soon as things grew in some measure quiet, the Spanish escort which he had made use of at first in the capital, and contented himself with the retinue of lictors sanctioned by traditional usage for the Roman supreme magistrates

However much of the ideal of his party and of his vouththe founding of a Periclean government in Rome not by virtue of the sword, but by virtue of the confidence of the nation-

ding no

supplies a parallel Certamly this too was an implacticable ideal-it was the sole illusion, in regard to which the earnest longing of that vigorous mind was more powerful than its clear judgment. A government, such as Caesar had in view, was not merely of necessity very much based on his personal influence, and so hable to perish with the death of its author just as the kindred creations of Pencles and Cromwell with the death of their founders, but, anudst the deeply disorganised state of the nation, it was not at all credible that the eighth king of Rome would succeed even for his inferime in ruling as his seven predecessors had ruled, his fellow burgesses merely by virtue of law and justice, and as little probable that he would succeed in incorporating the standing army-after it had duries the last civil war learned its power and unlearned its reverere -once more as a duly subordinate element in civil society any one who calmly considered to what extent reverence for the law had disappeared from the lowest as from the highest ranks of society, the former hope must have seemed almost a dream; and, if with the Marian reform of the military system the soldier generally had ceased to be a citizen (iii. 191), the Campanian mutiny and the battle-field of Thapsus showed with fatal clearness the nature of the support which the army now lent to the law. Even the great democrat could only with difficulty and imperfectly hold in check the powers which he had unchained; thousands of swords still flew at his signal from the scabbard, but they no longer returned to the scabbard at his signal. Fate is mightier than genius. Caesar desired to become the restorer of the civil commonwealth, and became the founder of the military monarchy which he abhorred; he overthrew the régime of aristocrats and bankers in the state, only to put a military régime in their place, and the commonwealth continued as before to be tyrannised and turned to profit by a privileged minority. And yet it is a privilege of the highest natures thus creatively to err. The brilliant attempts of great men to realise the ideal, though they do not reach their aim, form the best treasure of nations. It was owing to the work of Caesar that the Roman military state did not become a policestate till after the lapse of several centuries, and that the Roman Imperators, however little they otherwise resembled the great founder of their sovereignty, yet employed the soldier in the main not against the citizen but against the public foe, and esteemed both nation and army too highly to place the latter as constable over the former.

The regulation of financial matters occasioned comparatively little difficulty in consequence of the solid foundations which the immense magnitude of the empire and the exclusion of the system of credit supplied. If the state had hitherto found itself in perpetual financial embarrassment, the fault was far from chargeable on the inadequacy of the state revenues; on the contrary these had of late years immensely increased. To the earlier aggregate income, which is estimated at 200,000,000 sesterces (in round numbers £2,000,000) there were added 85,000,000 sesterces (£850,000) by the erection of the provinces of Bithynia-Pontus and Syria; which increase, along with the other newly opened up or augmented sources of income, especially from the constantly increasing produce of the taxes on luxuries, far outweighed the loss of the Campanian rents. Besides, immense sums had been brought from extraordinary sources into the exchequer through Lucullus, Metellus, Pompeius, Cato.

and others. The cause of the financial embarrassments rather lay partly in the increase of the ordinary and extraordinary expenditure, partly in the disorder of management. Under the former head, the distribution of corn to the multitude of the capital claimed exorbitant sums; through the extension given to it by Cato in 63 (p. 174) the yearly expenditure for that purpose amounted to 30,000,000 sesterces (£300,000) and after the abolition in 600 of the compensation hitherto paid, it swallowed up even a fifth of the state revenues. The military budget also had risen, since the garrisons of Cilicia, Syria, and Gaul had been added to those of Spain, Macedonia, and the other provinces. Among the extraordinary items of expenditure must be named in the first place the great cost of fitting out fleets, on which, for example, five years after the great razzia of $7, 34,000,000 sesterces (£340,000) were expended at once. Add to this the very considerable sums which were consumed in wars and warlike preparations; such as 18,000,000 sesterces (£180,000) paid at once to Piso merely for the outfit of the Macedonian army, 24,000,000 sesterces (£240,000) even annually to Pompeius for the maintenance and pay of the Spanish army, and similar sums to Caesar for the Gallic legions. But considerable as were these demands made on the Roman exchequer it would still have been able probably to meet them, had not its administration once so exemplary been affected by the universal laxity and dishonesty of this age; the payments of the treasury were often suspended merely because of the neglect to call up its outstanding claims. The magistrates placed over it, two of the quaestors-young men annually changed-contented the affinial etaff such posts had come to be bought and sold.

As soon however as the threads of Roman state-finance were concentrated no longer as hitherto in the senate, but in the cabinet of Caesar, new life, stricter order, and more compaction at once pervaded all the wheels and springs of that great machine. The two institutions, which originated with Gaius Gracchus and ate like a gangrene into the Roman financial system—the leasing of the direct taxes, and the distributions of crain—were partly abolished, partly remodelled. Caesar parasites whether high or low; and therefore he went in these two important questions not with Gaius Gracchus, but with the oligarch Sulla. The leasing system was allowed to continue for the indirect taxes, in the case of which it was very old and —under the maxim of Roman financial administration, which was retained inviolable also by Caesar, that the levying of the taxes should at any cost be kept simple and readily manageable —absolutely could not be dispensed with. But the direct taxes were thenceforth universally either treated, like the African and Sardinian deliveries of corn and oil, as contributions in kind to be directly supplied to the state, or converted, like the revenues of Asia Minor, into fixed money payments, in which case the collection of the several sums payable was entrusted to the tax-districts themselves.

The corn distributions in the capital had hitherto been looked on as a profitable prerogative of the community which ruled and, because it ruled, had to be fed by its subjects. This infamous principle was set aside by Caesar; but it could not be overlooked that a multitude of wholly destitute burgesses had been protected solely by these largesses of food from starvation. In this aspect Caesar retained them. While according to the Sempronian ordinance renewed by Cato every Roman burgess settled in Rome had possessed a legal claim to breadcorn without payment, this list of recipients, which had at last risen to the number of 320,000, was reduced by the exclusion of all individuals having means or otherwise provided for to 150,000, and this number was fixed once for all as the maximum number of recipients of free corn; at the same time an annual revision of the list was ordered, so that the places vacated by removal or death might be filled up with the most needful among the applicants. By this conversion of the political privilege into a provision for the poor, a principle remarkable in a moral as well as in a historical point of view came for the first time into living operation. Civil society but slowly and gradually attains to a perception of the interdependence of interests; in earlier antiquity the state doubtless protected its members from the public enemy and the murderer, but it was not bound to protect the totally helpless fellow-citizen from the worse enemy, want, by affording the needful means of subsistence. It was the Attic civilisation which first developed, in the Solonian and subsequent legislation, the principle that it is the duty of the community to provide for its invalids and for the poor generally; and it was Caesar that first developed what in the restricted compass of Attie life had remained a municipal matter into an organic institution of state, and transformed an arrangement which was a burden and a disgrace to the common wealth into the first of those institutions—in modern times equally numerous and beneficial—where the infinite depth of human compassion contends with the infinite depth of human misery

In addition to these fundamental reforms a thorough revision of the income and expenditure took place. The ordinary items of income were everywhere regulated and fixed Exemption from taxation was conferred on not a few communities and even on whole districts, whether indirectly by the bestowal of the Roman or Latin franchise, or directly by special privilege, it was obtained eg by all the Sicilian communities in the former, by the town of Ilion in the latter way Still greater was the number of those whose proportion of tribute was lowered, the communities in Further Spain, for instance, already after Caesar's governorship had on his suggestion a reduction of tribute granted to them by the senate, and now the deeply oppressed province of Asia had not only the levying of its direct taxes facilitated, but also a third of them wholly remitted The newly added taxes, such as those of the communities subdued in Illy 114 and above all of the Gallic communities-which latter together paid annually 40,000,000 sesterces (£400 000)—were fixed throughout on a low scale. It is true on the other hand that various towns such as Little Leptis in Africa Sulci in Sardinia and several Spanish communities, had their inbute raised by way of penalty for their conduct during the list war The very lucrative Italian harbour tolls abolished in the recent times of anarchy (p 184) were re-established all the more read by that this tax fell essentially on luxuries imported from the East To these new or revived sources of ordinary income were added the sums which accrued by extraordinary means, especially in consequence of the evel war, to the victor—the boots collected in Gaul, the stock of cash in the capital, the treasures taken from the Italian and Spanish temples, the sums raised in the shape of forced loan, compulsory present, or fine, from the dependent communities and dynasts, and the pecuman penaltics imposed in a similar way by judicial sentence, or simply by e no banel fa neighte bit sending an order to pay, on individual wealthy Romans; and above all things the proceeds from the estates of his defeated opponents. How productive these sources of income were, we may learn from the fact, that the fine of the African capitalists who sat in the opposition-senate alone amounted to 100,000,000 sesterces (£1,000,000) and the price paid by the purchasers of the property of Pompeius to 70,000,000 sesterces (£700,000). This course was necessary, because the power of the beaten nobility rested in great measure on their colossal wealth and could only be effectually broken by imposing on them the defrayment of the costs of the war. But the odium of the confiscations was in some measure mitigated by the fact that Caesar directed their proceeds solely to the benefit of the state, and, instead of overlooking after the manner of Sulla any act of fraud in his favourites, exacted the purchase-money with rigour even from his most faithful adherents such as Marcus Antonius.

In the expenditure a diminution was in the first place obtained by the considerable restriction of the largesses of grain. The distribution of corn to the poor of the capital which was retained, as well as the kindred supply of oil for the Roman baths newly introduced by Caesar, were at least in great part charged once for all on the contributions in kind from Sardinia and especially from Africa, and were thereby wholly or for the most part kept separate from the exchequer. On the other hand the regular expenditure for the military system was increased partly by the augmentation of the standing army, partly by the raising of the pay of the legionary from 480 sesterces (£5) to 900 (£9) annually. Both steps were in fact indispensable. There was a total want of any real defence for the frontiers, and an indispensable preliminary to it was a considerable increase of the army; and the doubling of the pay, although employed doubtless by Caesar to attach his soldiers to him (p. 344), was not introduced as a permanent alteration on that account. The former pay of  $1\frac{1}{3}$  sesterces  $(3\frac{1}{4}d.)$  per day had been fixed in very ancient times, when money had an altogether different value from that which it had in the Rome of Caesar's day; it could only have been retained down to a period when the common day-labourer in the capital earned by the labour of his hands daily on an average 3 sesterces  $(7\frac{1}{2}d.)$ , because in those times the soldier entered the army not for the sake of the pay, but chiefly for the sake of the-in great measure illicit-perquisites of military service. The first condition in order to a serious reform in the military system, and to the getting rid of those irregular gains of the soldier which formed a burden mostly on the provincials, was an increase suitable to the times in the regular pay, and the fixing of it at 2% sesterces (6% ) may be regarded as equitable, while the great burden thereby imposed on the treasury was a necessary, and in its consequences a very beneficial step

Of the amount of the extraordinary expenses which Caesar had to undertake or voluntarily undertook, it is difficult to form any conception The wars themselves consumed enormous sums, and sums perhaps not less were required to fulfil the promises which Caesar had been obliged to make during the civil war. It was a bad example and one unhappily not lost sight of in the sequel, that every common soldier received for his participation in the civil war 20,000 sesterces (£200) every burgess of the multitude in the capital for his non participation in it 300 sesterces (£3) as an addition to his aliment, but Caesar, after having once under the pressure of circumstances pledged his word, was too much of a king to abate from it Besides, Caesar answered innumerable demands of honourable liberality, and put into circulation immense sums for building more especially, which had been shamefully neglected during the financial distress of the last times of the republic-the cost of his buildings executed partly during the Gallic campaigns, partly afterwards, in the capital was reckoned at 160 000,000 (£1,600,000) The general result of the financial administration of Caesar is expressed in the fact that, while by sagacious and energetic reforms and by n right combination of economy and liberality he amply and fully met all equitable claims, never theless in March 240 there lay in the public treasury 700,000 000, and in his own 100,000,000 sesterces (together £8 000,000)-a sum which exceeded by tenfold the amount of cash in the treasury in the most flourishing times of the republic (ii 311)

But the task of breaking up the old parties and furnishing the new commonwealth with an appropriate constitution an efficient army, and well ordered finances, difficult as it was, was not the most difficult part of Caesar's work. If the Italian nation was really to be regenerated, it required a reorganisation which should transform all parts of the great empire-Rome, Italy, and the provinces-to the very foundation Let us endeavour here also to delineate the old state of things, as we ! as the beginnings of a new and more tolerable time disappeared from Rome. It is implied in the very nature of the case, that a capital loses its municipal and even its national stamp more quickly than any subordinate community. There the upper classes speedily withdraw from urban public life, in order to find their home rather in the state as a whole than in a single city; there are inevitably concentrated the foreign settlers, the fluctuating population of travellers on pleasure or business, the mass of the indolent, lazy, criminal, financially and morally bankrupt, and for that very reason cosmopolitan, rabble. All this pre-eminently applied to Rome. The opulent Roman frequently regarded his house in town merely as a lodging. When the urban municipal offices were converted into imperial magistracies; when the urban comitia became the assembly of burgesses of the empire; and when smaller selfgoverning tribal or other associations were not tolerated within the capital: all proper communal life ceased for Rome. From the whole compass of the widespread empire people flocked to Rome, for speculation, for debauchery, for intrigue, for accomplishment in crime, or even for the purpose of hiding there from the eye of the law.

The good stock of the Latin nation had long since wloly

These evils arose in some measure necessarily from the very nature of a capital; others more accidental and perhaps still more grave were associated with them. There has never perhaps existed a great city so thoroughly destitute of the means of support as Rome; importation on the one hand, and domestic manufacture by slaves on the other, rendered any free industry from the outset impossible there. The injurious consequences of the radical evil pervading the polities of antiquity in general -the slave-system-were more conspicuous in the capital than anywhere else. Nowhere were such masses of slaves accumulated as in the city palaces of the great families or of wealthy upstarts. Nowhere were the nations of the three continents mingled as in the slave population of the capital-Syrians, Phrygians and other half-Hellenes with Libyans and Moors, Getae and Iberians with the daily-increasing influx of Celts and Germans. The demoralisation inseparable from the absence of freedom, and the terrible inconsistency between formal and moral right, were far more glaringly apparent in the case of the half or wholly cultivated—as it were genteel—city-slave than in that of the rural serf who tilled the field in chains like the fettered ox. Still worse than the masses of slaves were those who had been de jure or simply de facto released from slaverya mixture of mendicant rabble, and extremely rich parvenus, no longer slaves and not yet fully burgesses, economically and even legally dependent on their master and yet with the pretensions of free men; these freedmen were peculiarly attracted towards the capital, where gain of various sorts was to be had and the retail traffic as well as the minor handicrafts were almost wholly in their hands. Their influence on the elections is expressly attested; and that they took a leading part in the street riots, is very evident from the ordinary signal by means of which these were as it were proclaimed by the demagogues the closing of the shops and places of sale.

to counteract but even en The judicious ! for a capital offence from dwelling in the capital, was not carried into effect by the negligent police. The police-supervision of the association and clubs of the rabble, so urgently required, was at first

pk. The the secent section of Apollo of Floor (12 58) and of Mother of the Gods, of Ceres, of Apollo, of Flora (u. 385) and of Victoria—lasted altogether sixty-two days; and to three were added the gladuatorial games and numerous other extraordinary amusements. The duty of providing grain at low prices—which was unavoidably necessary with such a protestrate living wholly from hand to mouth—was treated with the most unscrupulous frivolity, and the fluctuations in the price of bread-com were of a fabulous and incalculable description. Lastly, the distributions of grain formed an official invitation to the whole burgess-proletariate who were destitute of food and indisposed for work to take up their abode in the capital. The their root in this state of things. People were constantly are prospect prospect the raming Nowhere the capital; murder to the single murder trade peculiar to it; the alluring of the victum to stome was the

In Sinily, the country of production, the modese was sold wishin a few years at two and at twenty sestences; from this we may guess what must have been the fluctuations of price in Rome, which subsisted on train manne corn and was the seat of speculators.

preliminary to his assassination; no one ventured into the country in the vicinity of the capital without an armed retinue. Its outward condition corresponded to this inward disorganisation, and seemed a keen satire on the aristocratic government. Nothing was done for the regulation of the stream of the Tiber; excepting that they caused the only bridge, with which they still made shift (iii. 381), to be constructed of stone at least as far as the Tiber-island. As little was anything done toward the levelling of the city on the seven hills, except where perhaps the accumulation of rubbish had effected some improvement. The streets ascended and descended narrow and angular, and were wretchedly kept; the footpaths were small and ill paved. The ordinary houses were built of bricks negligently and to a giddy height, mostly by speculative builders on account of the small proprietors; by which means the former became prodigiously rich, and the latter were reduced to beggary. isolated islands amidst this sea of wretched buildings were seen the splendid palaces of the rich, which curtailed the space for the smaller houses just as their owners curtailed the burgessrights of smaller men in the state, and beside whose marble pillars and Greek statues the decaying temples, with their images of the gods still in great part carved of wood, made a melancholy figure. A police-supervision of streets, of riverbanks, of fires, or of building was almost unheard of; if the government troubled itself at all about the inundations, conflagrations, and falls of houses which were of yearly occurrence, it was only to ask from the state-theologians their report and advice regarding the true import of such signs and wonders. If we try to conceive to ourselves a London with the slavepopulation of New Orleans, with the police of Constantinople, with the non-industrial character of the modern Rome, and agitated by politics after the fashion of the Paris in 1848, we shall acquire an approximate idea of the republican glory, the departure of which Cicero and his associates in their sulky letters deplore.

Caesar did not deplore, but he sought to help so far as help was possible. Rome remained, of course, what it was—a cosmopolitan city. Not only would the attempt to give to it once more a specially Italian character have been impracticable; it would not have suited Caesar's plan. Just as Alexander found for his Graeco-Oriental empire an appropriate capital in the Hellenic, Jewish, Egyptian, and above all cosmopolitan Alexandria, so the capital of the new Romano-Hellenic universal empire, situated at the meeting-point of the East and the West, was to be not an Italian community, but the denationalised capital of many nations. For this reason Caesar tolerated the worship of the newly-settled Egyptian gods alongside of Father I-c and granted even to the Jews the free exercise of their house. How-

· pecially opposed

٥

its extension, it is significant, and reals for the capital he caused dramas to be performed not merely in Latin and Greek, but also in other languages, probably in Phoenician, Hebrew, Syrian, or Spanish

But, while Caesar accepted with the full consciousness of Unhapply the pitter, a readicated Caesar could not abolish slavery with its time is national calamities, it must remain an open question, whether he would in the course of time have attempted at least to limit the slave population in the capital, as he undertook to do so in another field. As little could Caesar conjure into existence a free industry in the capital, yet the great building-operations the capital of means of support there.

diminish the mass of the use process. To of persons brought by the com largesses to Rome was, it is of persons brought by the com largesses to Rome was, it is wholly stopped, at least very maternally restricted by the conversion of these largesses into a provision for the poor limited to a fixed number. The ranks of the existing proletanate were thinned on the one hand by the tribunals which were instructed to proceed with unrelenting rigour agunst the rabble, on the other hand by a comprehensive transmanne colonisation, of the 80 000 colonists, whom Caesar sent beyond the seas in it the population of the capital, indeed were freedmen But most or a -

to t interest that a political writer of later date t

this must have been more than a mere temporary arrangement; Caesar, convinced like every other man of sense that the only true remedy for the misery of the proletariate consisted in a well-regulated system of colonisation, and placed by the condition of the empire in a position to realise it to an almost unlimited extent, must have had the design of permanently continuing the process, and so opening up a constant means of abating an evil which was constantly reproducing itself. Measures were further taken to set bounds to the serious fluctuations in the price of the most important means of subsistence in the markets of the capital. The newly-organised and liberally-administered finances of the state furnished the means for this purpose, and two newly-nominated magistrates, the corn aediles (p. 454) were charged with the special supervision of the contractors and of the market of the capital.

The club system was checked, more effectually than was possible through prohibitive laws, by the change of the constitution; inasmuch as with the republic and the republican elections and tribunals the corruption and violence of the electioneering and judicial collegia—and generally the political Saturnalia of the canaille—came to an end of themselves. Moreover the combinations called into existence by the Clodian law were broken up, and the whole system of association was placed under the superintendence of the governing authorities. With the exception of the ancient guilds and associations, of the religious unions of the Jews, and of other specially excepted categories, for which a simple intimation to the senate seems to have sufficed, the permission to constitute a permanent society with fixed times of assembling and standing deposits was made dependent on a concession to be granted by the senate after the consent of the monarch had been obtained.

To this was added a stricter administration of criminal justice and an energetic police. The laws, especially as regards the crime of violence, were rendered more severe; and the irrational regulation of the republican law, that the convicted criminal was entitled to withdraw himself from a part of the penalty which he had incurred by self-banishment, was with reason set aside. The detailed regulations, which Caesar issued regarding the police of the capital, are in great part still preserved; and all who choose may convince themselves that the Imperator did not disdain to insist on the house proprietors putting the streets into repair and paving the footpath in its whole breadth with hewn stones, and to issue appropriate enactments regarding the carrying of litters and the driving of waggons, which from the nature of the streets were only allowed to move freely through the capital in the evening and by night. The supervision of the local police remained as hitherto chiefly with the four aediles, who were instructed now at least, if not earlier, each to superintend a distinctly marked-off police district within the capital

Lastly, building in the capital, and the provision connected therewith, of institutions for the public benefit, received from Caesar-who combined in himself the love for building of a Roman and of an organiser-a sudden stimulus, which not . chame the mismanagement of the recent anarchic mere) times their the h.

sar surpassed It was not merely by the extent of the puncuing ... hes and the magnitude of the sums expended on them that Caesar excelled his predecessors, but a genuine statesmanly perception of what was for the public good distinguishes what Caesar did for the public institutions of Rome from all similar services not build, like his successors, temples and other splendid structures, but he relieved the market place of Rome-in which the burgess assemblies, the sents of the chief courts, the exchange, and the daily business as well as the daily idleness, still were crowded together-it any rate from the assemblies and the courts by constructing for the former a new commum, the Saepta Julia in the Campus Martius, and for the latter a separate place of judicature, the Forum Julium between the Capitol and Palatine Of a Lindred spirit is the arrangement originating with him, by which there were supplied to the biths of the capital annually three million pounds of oil, mostly from Africa, and they were thereby enabled to furnish to the bathers the oil required for the anointing of the body gratuitously-a measure of clembiness and samitary police which, according to the ancient dietetics based substantially on bathing and anom ing was highly judicious existed in riches and glory. Still more brilliant was the idea of altering the whole lower course of the Tiber and of conducting it from the present Ponte Molle-instead of between the Campus Vaticanus and the Campus Martius to Ostia-round the Campus Vaticanus and the Janiculum across the Pomptine marshes to the port of Tarracina. By this gigantic plan three objects would have been accomplished at once: the extremely limited facilities for building in the capital would have been enlarged by substituting the Campus Vaticanus now transferred to the left bank of the Tiber for the Campus Martius, and employing the latter spacious field for public and private edifices; the Pomptine marshes and the Latin coast generally would have been drained; and the capital would have been supplied with a safe seaport, the want of which was so painfully felt. seemed as if the Imperator would remove mountains and rivers, and venture to confend with nature herself.

But these noble arrangements were only the first steps towards a complete remodelling of Rome Projects were already formed for a new senate house, for a new magnificent baraar for a theatre to rival that of Pomperus, for a public Latin and Greek library after the model of that recently destroyed a Alexandria-the first institution of the sort in Rome-lastir for a temple of Mars, which was to surpass all that had hither's

Much however as the city of Rome gained by the new order of things in commodiousness and magnificence, its political supremacy was, as we have already said, lost to it irrecoverably through that very change. The idea that the Roman state should coincide with the city of Rome had indeed in the course of time become more and more unnatural and preposterous; but the maxim had been so intimately blended with the essence of the Roman republic, that it could not perish before the republic itself. It was only in the new state of Caesar that it was, with the exception perhaps of some legal fictions, completely set aside, and the community of the capital was placed legally on a level with all other municipalities; indeed Caesar-here as everywhere endeavouring not merely to regulate the thing, but also to call it officially by the right name—issued his Italian municipal ordinance, beyond doubt purposely, at once for the capital and for the other urban communities. We may add that Rome, just because it was incapable of a living communal character as a capital, was even essentially inferior to the other municipalities of the imperial period. The republican Rome was a den of robbers, but it was at the same time the state: the Rome of the monarchy, although it began to embellish itself with all the glories of the three continents and to glitter in gold and marble, was yet nothing in the state but a royal residence in connection with a poor-house, or in other words a necessary evil.

While in the capital the only object aimed at was to get rid of palpable evils by police ordinances on the greatest scale, it was a far more difficult task to remedy the deep disorganisation of Italian society. Its radical misfortunes were those which we during this ption perhaps the manage

ment of estates, no material difference is perceptible between the Catoman system formerly set forth (n 342 351) and that described to us by Varro, except that the latter shows the traces for better and for worse of the progress of fashionable life in "Formerly," says Varro, ' the barn on the estate was larger than the manor house, now it is wont to be the reverse' In the domains of Tusculum and Tibur, on the shores of Tarra cina and Baiae-where the old Latin and Italian farmers had sown and reaped-there now rose in barren splendour the villas of the Roman nobles, some of which covered the space of a moderate sized town with their appurtenances of garden grounds and aqueducts, fresh and salt water ponds for the preservation and breeding of river and marine fishes, nurseries of snails and slugs, game preserves for keeping hares, rabbits, stags, roes, and wild boars, and avianes in which even cranes and peacocks were kept. But the luxury of a great city enriches also many an industrious hand, and supports more poor than philanthrop) with its expenditure of alms Those aviaries and fishponds of the grandees were of course under ordinary circumstances a very costly indulgence But this system was carried to such an extent and prosecuted with so much keenness, that eg the stock of a pigeon house was valued at 100,000 sesterces (£1000) a methodical system of fattening had sprung up, and the manure got from the aviaries became of importance in agriculture, .a single bird-dealer was able to furnish at once 5000 fieldfaresfor they knew how to rear these also-at three derarn (25) each, and a single possessor of a fishpond 2000 muraenae, and the fishes left behind by Lucius Lucullus brought 42 000 sesterces (£400) As may readily be concerted, under such circumstarces any one who followed this occupation industriously and intelligently might obtain very large profits with a comparatively small outlay of capital A small bee breeder of this period sold from his thyme-garden not larger than an acre in the neighbourhood of Falerii honey to an average annual amount of at least 10,000 sesterces (£100). The rivalry of the growers of fruit was carried so far, that in elegant villas the fruit-chamber lined with marble was not unfrequently fitted up at the same time as a dining-room, and sometimes fine fruit acquired by purchase was exhibited there as of home growth. At this period the cherry from Asia Minor and other foreign fruit-trees were first planted in the gardens of Italy. The vegetable gardens, the beds of roses and violets in Latium and Campania, yielded rich produce, and the "market for dainties" (forum cupedinis) by the side of the Via Sacra, where fruits, honey, and chaplets were wont to be exposed for sale, played an important part in the life of the capital. Generally the management of estates, worked as they were on the planter-system, had reached in an economic point of view a height scarcely to be surpassed. The valley of Rieti, the region round the Fucine lake, the districts on the Liris and Volturnus, and indeed Central Italy in general, were as respects husbandry in the most flourishing condition; even certain branches of industry, which were suitable accompaniments of the management of an estate by means of slaves, were taken up by intelligent landlords, and, where the circumstances were favourable, inns, weaving factories, and especially brickworks were constructed on the estate. The Italian producers of wine and oil in particular not only supplied the Italian markets, but carried on also in both articles a considerable business of transmarine exportation. A homely professional treatise of this period compares Italy to a great fruit-garden; and the pictures which a contemporary poet gives of his beautiful native land, where the well-watered meadow, the luxuriant corn-field, the pleasant vine-covered hill are fringed by the dark line of the olive-trees—where the "ornament" of the land, smiling in varied charms, cherishes the loveliest gardens in its bosom and is itself wreathed round by food-producing trees these descriptions, evidently faithful pictures of the landscape daily presented to the eye of the poet, transplant us into the most flourishing districts of Tuscany and Terra di Lavoro. The pastoral husbandry, it is true, which for reasons formerly explained was always spreading farther especially in the south and south-east of Italy, was in every respect a retrograde movement; but it too participated to a certain degree in the general progress of agriculture; much was done for the improvement of the breeds, e.g. asses for breeding brought 60,000 sesterces (£600), 100,000 (£1000), and even 400,000 (£4000). The solid Italian husbandry obtained at this period, when the general development of intelligence and abundance of capital rendered it fruitful, far more brilliant results than ever the old system of small cultivators could have given; and was carried even already beyond the bounds of Italy, for the Italian agriculturist turned to account large tracts in the provinces by raising cattle and even cultivating corn.

In order to show what dimensions money-dealing assumed by the side of this estate-husbandry unnaturally prospering over the rum of the small farmers, how the Italian merchants 11 the Tone poured themselves into all the provinces and flower

said, to pourt to un man

the capital the regular rate of interest at this time was six per cent., and consequently money there was cheaper by a half than it was on an average elsewhere in antiquity.

In consequence of this economic system based both in its agrarian and mercantile aspects on masses of capital and on speculation, there arose a most fearful disproportion in the distribution of wealth.

of a commonwealth or applies perhaps nowhere so completely as to the last age of the republic; and nowhere perhaps has the essential maxim of the slave-state-that the rich man who lives by the exertions of his slaves is necessarily respectable, and the poor man who lives by the labour of bis hands is necessarily vulgar ---- ain as the undoubted ant is char-· turtius nist quan

ministrae sunt voluptatum,

10000

" Cetaris, lanis, coqui, fartores, piscalores,

a 23 - hore sa blacet, unguentarios, saliatores, totumque including of their aut to the ut doctrina rerum nestat, Stercaura

middle class in our sense of the term there was not, as indeed no such class can exist in any fully developed slave-state; what appears as if it were a good middle class and is so in a certain measure, is composed of those rich men of business and landholders who are so uncultivated or so highly cultivated as to content themselves within the sphere of their activity and to keep aloof from public life. Of the men of business—n class, among whom the numerous freedmen and other upstarts, as a rule, were seized with the giddy fancy of playing the man of quality—there were not very many who showed so much judgment. A model of this sort was the Titus Pomponius Atticus frequently mentioned in the accounts of this period. He acquired an immense fortune partly from the great estatefarming which he prosecuted in Italy and Epirus, partly from his money-transactions which ramified throughout Italy, Greece, Macedonia, and Asia Minor; but at the same time he continued to be throughout the simple man of business, did not allow himself to be seduced into soliciting office or even into monetary transactions with the state, and, equally remote from the avaricious niggardliness and from the prodigal and burdensome luxury of his time—his table, for instance, was maintained at a daily cost of 100 sesterces (£1)—contented himself with an easy existence appropriating to itself the charms of a country and a city life, the pleasures of intercourse with the best society of Rome and Greece, and all the enjoyments of literature and art.

More numerous and more solid were the Italian landholders of the old type. Contemporary literature preserves in the description of Sextus Roscius, who was murdered amidst the proscriptions of  $\frac{67}{61}$ , the picture of such a rural nobleman (pater familias rusticanus); his wealth, estimated at 6,000,000 sesterces (£60,000), is mainly invested in his thirteen landed estates; he attends to the management of it in person systematically and antem, si tenuis est, sordida putanda est; sin magna et copiosa, multa undique apportans, multaque sine vanitate impertiens, non est admodum vituperanda; atque etiam, si satiata quaestu, vel contenta potius; ut sacpe ex alto in portum, ex ipso portu in agros se possessionesque contulerit, videtur optimo jure posse laudari. Omnium autem rerum, ex quibus aliquid acquiritur, nihil est agricultura melius, nihil uberius, nihil dulcius, nihil homine libero dignius. According to this the respectable man must, in strictness, be a landowner; the trade of a merchant becomes him only so far as it is a means to this ultimate end; science as a profession is suitable only for the Greeks and for Romans not belonging to the ruling classes, who by this means may purchase at all events a certain toleration of their personal presence in genteel circles. It is a thoroughly developed aristocracy of planters, with a strong infusion of mercantile speculation and a slight shading of general culture.

with enthusiasm, he comes seldom or never to the capital, and, when he does appear there, by his clownish manners he contrasts not less with the polished senator than the innumerable hosts of his uncouth rural slaves with the elegant train of domestic slaves in the capital. Far more than the circles of the nobility with their cosmopolitan culture and the mercantile class at home everywhere and nowhere, these landlords and the " country towns" to which they essentially gave tone (municipia rusticana) preserved as well the discipline and manners as the pure and noble language of their fathers The order of landlords was regarded as the flower of the nation, the speculator, who has made his fortune and wishes to appear among the notables of the land, buys an estate and seeks, if not to become himself the squire, at any rate to rear his son with that view meet the traces of this class of landlords wherever a national movement appears in politics and wherever literature puts forth any fresh growth, from it the patriotic opposition to the new monarchy drew its best strength, to it belonged Varro, Lucretius, Catullus, and nowhere perhaps does the comparative freshness of this landlord life come more characteristically to light than in the graceful Arpinate introduction to the second book of Cicero's treatise De Legibus-a green casis amidat the fearful desert of that equally empty and voluminous writer

But the cultivated class of merchants and the vigorous order of landlords were far overgrown by the two classes that gave tone to society—the mass of beggers, and the world of quality

We have no statistical figures to indicate precisely the relative proportions of poverty and riches for this epoch; yet we may here perhaps again recall the expression which a Roman statesman employed some fifty years before (ii 130)—that the number of families of firmly established inches among the Roman burgesses did not amount to 2000. The burgesbody had since then become different, but clear indications attest that the disproportion between poor and rich had remained at least as great. The increasing impovenshment of the multitude shows itself only too planth in their crowding to the corn largesses and to enlistment in the army, the corresponding increase of inches is attested expressly by an author of this generation, when, speaking of the circumstances of the

Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus promised to twenty thousand soldiers four ingera of land each out of his own property; the estate of Pompeius amounted to 70,000,000 sesterces (£700,000) that of Aesopus the actor to 20,000,000 (£200,000); Marcus Crassus, the richest of the rich, possessed at the outset of his career, 7,000,000 (£70,000), at its close, after lavishing enormous sums on the people, 170,000,000 sesterces (£1,700,000). The effect of such poverty and such riches was on both sides an economic and moral disorganisation outwardly different, but at bottom of the same character. If the common man was saved from starvation only by support from the resources of the state, it was the necessary consequence of this mendicant miscry -although it also reciprocally appears as a cause of it-that he addicted himself to the beggar's laziness and to the beggar's good cheer. The Roman plebeian was fonder of gazing in the theatre than of working; the taverns and brothels were so frequented that the demagogues found their special account in gaining the possessors of such establishments over to their interests. The gladiatorial games—which revealed, at the same time that they fostered, the worst demoralisation of the ancient world—had become so flourishing that a lucrative business was done in the sale of the programmes for them; and it was at this time that the horrible innovation was adopted by which the decision as to the life or death of the vanquished became dependent, not on the law of duel or on the pleasure of the victor, but on the caprice of the onlooking public, and according to its signal the victor either spared or transfixed his prostrate antagonist. The trade-of fighting had so risen or freedom had so fallen in value, that the intrepidity and the emulation, which were lacking on the battle-fields of this age, were universal in the armies of the arena, and, where the law of the duel required, every gladiator allowed himself to be stabbed mutely and without shrinking; that in fact free men not unfrequently sold themselves to the contractors for board and wages as gladiatorial slaves. The plebeians of the fifth century had also suffered want and famine, but they had not sold their freedom; and still less would the jurisconsults of that period have lent themselves to pronounce the equally immoral and illegal contract of such a gladiatorial slave "to let himself be chained, scourged, burnt, or killed without opposition, if the laws of the institution should so require" by means of unbecoming juristic subtleties as a contract lawful and actionable.

In the world of quality such things did not occur, but at bottom it was hardly different, and least of all better. In doing nothing the aristocrat boldly competed with the proletarian; if the latter lounged on the pavement, the former by in bed till far on in the day. Extravagance prevailed here as unbounded as it was devoid of taste. It was laished on nableic and on the theatre, of course to the corruption of both; · . : " ---- Wa nrice-in the .: >,000,000 in the drama was spout in the man. . Rents in Rome appear to have been on an average four times as high as in the country towns, a house there was once sold for 15,000,000 sesterces (£150,000) The house of Marcus Lep dus (consul in (2)) which was at the time of the death of Sulla the finest in Rome, did not runk a generation afterwards even as the hundredth on the list of Roman palaces. We have already mentioned the extravagance practised in the matter of country. houses, we find that 4,000,000 sestences (£40,000) were paid for such a house, which was valued chiefly for its fishpond; and the thoroughly fashionable grandee now needed at least two villas-one in the Sabine or Alban mountains near the capital, and a second in the vicinity of the Campanian baths-and in addition if possible a garden immediately outside of the gates of Rome Still more irrational than these villa-palices were the palatial sepulchres, several of which still existing at the present day attest what a lofty pile of masonry the neh Roman needed in order to die as became his rank. Funciers of horses and dogs too were not wanting; 24,000 secteres (£240) was no uncommon price for a showy horse. They indulged in furniture of fine wood-a table of Alnean cypress-wood cost 1,000,000 sesterces (£10,000), in dresses of purple stuffs or trunsparent gauzes accompanied by an elegant adjustment of their felds before the mirror—the orator Hortensius is said to have bre ight an action of damages against a colleague because he rufled hus dress in a crowd, in precious stones and pearls, which first at this period took the place of the far more beautiful and more artistic ornaments of gold-it was already utier barbarum, when at the triumph of Pompeius over Mithradates the image of the victor appeared wrought wholly of pearls, and when the solas and the thelves in the dining-hall were silver mounted and even the kitchen-utensils were made of silver. In a similar spirit the collectors of this period took out the artistic medallions from the old silver cups, to set them anew in vessels of gold. Nor was there any lack of luxury also in travelling. "When the governor travelled," Cicero tells us as to one of the Sicilian governors, "which of course he did not in winter, but only at the beginning of spring—not the spring of the calendar but the beginning of the season of roses—he had himself conveyed, as was the custom with the kings of Bithynia, in a litter with eight bearers, sitting on a cushion of Maltese gauze stuffed with rose-leaves, with one garland on his head and a second twined round his neck, applying to his nose a little smelling-bag of fine linen, with minute meshes, filled with roses; and thus he had himself carried even to his bedchamber."

But no sort of luxury flourished so much as the coarsest of all—the luxury of the table. The whole villa arrangements and the whole villa life had ultimate reference to dining; not only had they different dining-rooms for winter and summer, but dinner was served in the picture-gallery, in the fruitchamber, in the aviary, or on a platform erected in the deerpark, around which, when the bespoken "Orpheus" appeared in theatrical costume and blew his flourish, the duly trained roes and wild boars congregated. Such was the care bestowed on decoration; but amidst all this the reality was by no means forgotten. Not only was the cook a graduate in gastronomy, but the master himself often acted as the instructor of his cooks. The roast had been long ago thrown into the shade by marine fishes and oysters; now the Italian river-fishes were utterly banished from good tables, and Italian delicacies and Italian wines were looked on as almost vulgar. Now even at the popular festivals there were distributed, besides the Italian Falerian, three sorts of foreign wine—Sicilian, Lesbian, Chian, while a generation before it had been sufficient even at great banquets to send round Greek wine once; in the cellar of the orator Hortensius there was found a stock of 10,000 jars (at 33 quarts) of foreign wine. It was no wonder that the Italian wine growers began to complain of the competition of the wines from the Greek islands. No naturalist could ransack land and sea more zealously for new animals and plants than the epicures of that day ransacked them for new culinary dainties. The popular poet of this age an oath is called "the plaster for debts' Men had forgotten what honesty was, a person who refused a bribe was regarded not as an upright man, but as a personal foe. The criminal statistics of all times and countries will hardly furnish a parallel to the dreadful picture of crimes—so wared so horrible, and so unnatural—which the trial of

 $^1$  We have still (Macrobius, iii. 13) the bill of fare of the banquet, which Mucius Lentulus Niger gave before  $^{6.31}_{6.3}$  on entering on his pontificate, and of which the pontifices—Caesar included—the Vestal Virgins, and some other priests and ladies nearly related to them partook. Before the dinner proper eame sea-hedgehogs; fresh oysters as many as the guests wished; large mussels; sphondyli; fieldfares with asparagus; fattened fowls;

but while it the no on o

thus constantly accumulating more and more deleterously and deeply, so much the more smooth and glittering was the surface, overlaid with the varnish of poli hed manners and universal friendship. All the world interchanged visits, so that in the houses of quality it was necessary to admit the persons presenting themselves every morning for the levee in a certain order fixed by the master or occasionally by the attendant in waiting, and to give audience only to the more notable one by one, while the rest were more summarily admitted partly in groups, partly in a body at the close-a distinction which Gains Gracchus, in this too the first founder of the new monarchy, is said to have introduced. The interchange of letters of courtesy was carried to as great an extent as the visits of courtesy, ' friendly ' letters flew over land and sea between persons who had neither personal relations nor business with each other, whereas proper and formal business letters scarcely occur except where the letter is addressed to a corporation In like manner invitations to dunier, the customars new year's presents, the domestic festivals, were divested of their proper character and converted almost into public ceremonials, even death itself did not release the Roman from these attentions to his countless neighbours' but in order to die with due respectability he had to provide each of them at any rate with a keepsake Just as in certain circles of our mercantile world the genume intimacy of family ties and family friendships had so totally vanished from the Rome of that day that the whole intercourse of business and acquaintance could be gamished with forms and flourishes of affection which had het all meaning, and thus by degrees the reality came to be superseded by that spectral shadow of "friendship" which holds by no means the least place among the various evil spirits brooding over the proscriptions and civil wars of this age

An equally characteristic feature in the brilliant decay of this period was the emancipation of women. In an economic po-of view the women had long since made themselves independent (ii. 384); in the present epoch we even meet with solicitors acting specially for women, who officiously lend their aid to solitary rich ladies in the management of their property and their lawsuits, make an impression on them by their knowledge of business and law, and thereby procure for themselves ampler perquisites and legacies than other loungers on the exchange. But it was not merely from the economic guardianship of father or husband that women felt themselves emancipated. Loveintrigues of all sorts were constantly in progress. The balletdancers (mimac) were quite a match for those of the present day in the variety of their pursuits and the skill with which they followed them out; their primadonnas, Cytheris and the like, pollute even the pages of history. But their, as it were, licensed trade was very materially injured by the free art of the ladies of aristoeratic circles. Liaisons in the first houses had become so frequent, that only a scandal altogether exceptional could make them the subject of special talk; a judicial interference seemed now almost ridiculous. An unparalleled seandal, such as Publius Clodius produced in 693 at the women's festival in the house of the Pontifex Maximus, although a thousand times worse than the occurrences which fifty years before had led to a series of capital sentences (iii. 409), passed almost without investigation and wholly without punishment. The wateringplace season-in April, when political business was suspended and the world of quality congregated in Baiae and Puteoli-derived its chief charm from the relations lieit and illicit which, along with music and song and elegant breakfasts on board or on shore, enlivened the gondola voyages. There the ladies held absolute sway; but they were by no means content with this domain which rightfully belonged to them; they also acted as politicians, appeared in party conferences, and took part with their money and their intrigues in the wild coterie-proceedings of the time. Any one who beheld these female statesmen performing on the stage of Scipio and Cato and saw at their side the young fop—as with smooth chin, delicate voice, and mincing gait, with headdress and neckerchiefs, frilled robe, and women's sandals he copied the loose courtesan-might well have a horror of the unnatural world, in which the sexes seemed as though they wished to change parts. What ideas as to divorce prevailed in the circles of the aristocracy may be discerned in the conduct of their best and most moral hero Marcus Cato, who did not hesitate to separate from his wife at the request of a

CHAP. XI.

It has desolated God's fair world in the same way. As nivers glisten in different colours, but a common sewer everywhere looks like triself, so the Italy of the Ciercoman epoch resembles substantially the Hellas of Polybius and still more decidedly the Carthage of Hannibal's time, where in exactly similar fashion the all powerful rule of capital runed the middle class, ruised trade and estate farming to the highest prosperity, and ultimately led to a—hypocritically whitewashed—moral and political corruption of the nation. All the arrant sins that capital has been guilty of against nation and critisation in the modern world, remain as far inferior to the abominations of the ancient capitalist states as the free man, be he ever so poor, remains superior to the slave, and not until the drigon seed of North America ripens, will the world have again similar fruits to reap.

These cyils, under which the national economy of Italy lay prostrate, were in their deepest essence irremediable, and so much of them as still admitted of remedy depended essentially for its amendment on the people and on time, for the wisest government is as little able as the most skilful physician to give freshness to the corrupt juices of the organism, or to do more in the case of the deeper rooted evils than to prevent those accidents which obstruct the remedial power of nature in its working The peaceful energy of the new rule even of itself furnished such a preventive, for by its means some of the word sexcrescences were done away, such as the artificial pampering of the proletariate, the impunity of crimes, the purchase of offices, and various others But the government could do something more than simply abstain from harm. Caesar was not one of those over wise people who refuse to embank the eta, because forsooth no dike can dely some sudden influx of the tide It is better, if a nation and its economy follow spontaneously the path prescribed by nature, but, seeing that the had go out of this path, Caesar applied all his energies to bring tack by special intervention the nation to its home and family life, and to reform the national economy by law and decree were enjoined not to be absent from Italy for more than three consecutive years. In the same spirit Caesar had already in his first consulship on founding the colony of Capua kept specially in view fathers who had several children (p. 188); and now as Imperator he proposed extraordinary rewards for the fathers of numerous families, while he at the same time as supreme judge of the nation treated divorce and adultery with a vigour according to Roman ideas unparalleled.

With a view to check the continued absence of the Italians from Italy and to induce the world of quality and the merchant to establish their homes in their native land, not only net its term of service for the soldiers shortened, but men of senatoral rank altogether prohibited from taking up their abode of the Italy except when on public business, while the other Italians of marriageable age (from the twentieth to the fortieth year)

Nor did he even think it beneath his dignity to issue a detailed law as to luxury—which, among other points, cut down extravagance in building at least in one of its most irrational forms, that of sepulchral monuments; restricted the use of purple robes and pearls to certain times, ages, and classes, and totally prohibited it in grown-up men; fixed a maximum for the expenditure of the table; and directly forbade a number of luxurious dishes. Such ordinances doubtless were not new; but it was a new thing that the "master of morals" seriously insisted on their observance, superintended the provisionmarkets by means of paid overseers, and ordered that the tables of men of rank should be examined by his officers and the forbidden dishes on them should be confiscated. It is true that by such theoretical and practical instructions in moderation as the new monarchical police gave to the fashionable world hardly more could be accomplished than the compelling luxury. to retire somewhat more into concealment; but, if hypocrisy is the homage which vice pays to virtue, under the circumstances of the times even a semblance of propriety enforced by police measures was a step towards improvement not to be despised.

The measures of Caesar for the better regulation of Italian monetary and agricultural relations were of a graver character and promised greater results. The first question here related to temporary enactments respecting the scarcity of money and the debt-crisis generally. The law called forth by the outcry as to locked-up capital—that no one should have on hand more than 60,000 sesterces (£600) in gold and silver cash—was probably only issued to allay the indignation of the blind public against the usurers; the form of publication, which proceeded on the fiction that this was merely the renewed enforcing of an earlier law that had fallen into oblivion, shows that Caesar was ashamed of this enactment, and it can hardly have passed into actual application. A far more serious question was the treatment of the pending claims for debt, the complete remission of which was vehemently demanded from Caesar by the party which called itself by his name. We have already mentioned that be did not yield to this demand (p 433), but two important concessions were made to the debtors, and that as early as Th. First, the interest in arrear was struck off,1 and that which was paid was deducted from the capital Secondly, the creditor was compelled to accept the movable and immovable property of the debtor in lieu of payment at the estimated value which his effects had before the civil war and the general depreciation which it had occasioned The latter enactment was not unreasonable, if the creditor was to be looked on de facto as the owner of the property of his debtor to the amount of the sum due to him, it was doubtless proper that he should bear his share in the general depreciation of the property. On the other hand the cancelling of the payments of interest made or outstanding -which practically amounted to this, that the creditors lost, besides the interest itself, on an average 25 per cent. of what they were entitled to claim as capital at the time of the issuing of the law-was in fact nothing else than a partial concession of that cancelling of creditor's claims springing out of loans for which the democrats had clamoured so vehemently, and, bowever bad may have been the conduct of the usurers, it is not possible thereby to justify the universal and retrospective abolition of all claims for interest without distinction. In order at least to understand it, we must recollect how the demo a party stood towards the question of interest. The legal against taking interest, which the old plebeum isition had extorted in $\frac{1}{2}\frac{1}{2}$ (1 300), had no doubt been practically, disregarded by the nobility which controlled the envil procedure by means of the practically, but had still renaired since that period formally valid, and the democrats of the seventh century, who regarded themselves throughout as the continuous of that old agutation as to privilege and secial position (p 163), had maintained the illegality of payment of interest at any time, and even already practically, enforced that principle at least temporarily, in the confusion of the Marian period (iii 243). It is not credible that Caesar shared the crude view of his party on the interest question, the fact, that in his account of the matter of liquidation he mentions the enactment as to the surrender of the property of the dolbro in leu of payment.

but is silent as to the cancelling of the interest, is perhaps a tacit self-reproach. But he was, like every party-leader, dependent on his party and could not directly repudiate the traditional maxims of the democracy in the question of interest; the more especially when he had to decide this question, not as the all-powerful conqueror of Pharsalus, but even before his departure for Epirus. But, while he permitted perhaps rather than originated this violation of legal order and of property, it is certainly his merit that that monstrous demand for the annulling of all claims arising from loans was rejected; and it may perhaps be looked on as a saving of his honour, that the debtors were far more indignant at the—according to their view extremely unsatisfactory—concession given to them than the injured creditors, and made under Caelius and Dolabella those foolish and (as already mentioned) speedily frustrated attempts to extort by riot and civil war what Caesar refused to them.

But Caesar did not confine himself to helping the debtor at the moment; he did what as legislator he could permanently to keep down the fearful omnipotence of capital. First of all the great legal maxim was proclaimed, that freedom is not a possession commensurable with property, but an eternal right of man, of which the state is entitled judicially to deprive the criminal alone, not the debtor. It was Caesar, who, perhaps stimulated in this case also by the more humane Egyptian and Creek legislation associally that of Salan introduced the Greek legislation, especially that of Solon, introduced this principle—diametrically opposed to the maxims of the earlier ordinances as to debt-into the common law, where it has since retained its place undisputed. According to Roman law the debtor unable to pay became the slave of his creditor (i. 160). The Poetelian law no doubt had allowed a debtor, who had become unable to pay through temporary embarrassments. not through genuine insolvency, to save his personal freedom by the cession of his property (i. 301); nevertheless for the really insolvent that principle of law, though doubtless modified in secondary points, had been in substance retained unaltered for five hundred years; a direct recourse to the debtor's estate only occurred exceptionally, when the debtor had died or had forfeited his burgess-rights or could not be found. It was

&lt;sup>1</sup> The Egyptian royal laws (Diodorus, i. 79) and likewise the legislation of Solon (Plutarch, Sol. 13, 15) forbade bonds in which the loss of the personal liberty of the debtor was made the penalty of non-payment; and at least the latter imposed on the debtor in the event of bankruptcy no more than the cession of his whole assets.

Caesar who first gave an insolvent the right—on which our modern bankruptcy regulations are based—of formally ceding his estate to his creditors, whether it might suffice to satisfy them or not, so as to save at all events his personal freedom although with diminished honorary and political rights, and to begin a new financial existence, in which he could only be sued on account of claims proceeding from the earlier period and not protected in the liquidation, if he could pay them without renewed financial ruin.

While thus the great democrat had the imperishable honour of emancipating personal freedom in principle from capital, be attempted moreover to impose a police limit on the excessive power of capital by usury-laws. He did not affect to disown the democratic antipathy to stipulations for interest. For Italian money-dealing there was fixed a maximum amount of the loans at interest to be allowed in the case of the individual capitalist, which appears to have been proportioned to the Italian landed estate belonging to each, and perhaps amounted to half its value. Transgressions of this enactment were, after the fashion of the procedure prescribed in the republican usury-commission. If these regulations were successfully carried into effect, every Italian man of business would be compelled into effect, every Italian man of business would be compelled.

of insolvent landowners who practically managed that estationerly for their creditors was by this means materially curtailed, inasmuch as the creditors, if they desired to continue their lending business, were compelled to buy for themselves. From this very fact besides it is plain that Caesar wished by no means the the old the continue their continues that the continues to Italy—of a maximum amount of sums to be tent, but also, especially with respect to the provinces, presented maximum rates for interest itself. The enactments—that it was illegal to take higher interest than 1 per cent, per month, or to take interest on arrears of interest, or in fine to make a judicial claim for arrears of interest to a greater amount than a surequal to the capital—were, probably also after the Gracco-

Egyptian model,<sup>1</sup> first introduced in the Roman empire by Lucius Lucullus for Asia Minor and retained there by his better successors; soon afterwards they were transferred to other provinces by edicts of the governors, and ultimately at least part of them was provided with the force of law in all provinces by a decree of the Roman senate of  $\frac{7.04}{50}$ . The fact that these Lucullan enactments afterwards appear in all their compass as imperial law and so became the basis of the Roman and indeed of modern legislation as to interest, may perhaps be traceable to an ordinance of Caesar.

Hand in hand with these efforts to guard against the ascendancy of capital went the endeavours to bring back agriculture to the path which was most advantageous for the commonwealth. For this purpose the improvement of the administration of justice and of police was very essential. Hitherto nobody in Italy had been sure of his life and of his movable or immovable property; Roman condottieri for instance, at the intervals when their gangs were not helping to manage the politics of the capital, applied themselves to robbery in the forests of Etruria or rounded off the country estates of their paymasters by fresh acquisitions; but this sort of club-law was now at an end; and in particular the agricultural population of all classes must have felt the beneficial effects of the change. The plans of Caesar for great works also, which were not at all limited to the capital, were intended to tell in this respect; the construction, for instance, of a convenient high road from Rome through the passes of the Apennines to the Adriatic was designed to stimulate the internal traffic of Italy, and the lowering the level of the Fucine lake to benefit the Marsian farmers. But Caesar also sought by more direct measures to influence the state of Italian husbandry. The Italian graziers were required to take at least a third of their herdsmen from freeborn adults, whereby brigandage was checked and at the same time a source of gain was opened to the free proletariate. In the agrarian question Caesar who already in his first consulship had been in a position to regulate it (p. 188), more judicious than Tiberius Gracchus, did not seek to restore the farmer-system at any price, even at that of a revolution concealed under juristic clauses-directed against property; by him on the contrary, as by every other genuine statesman, the security of that which is property or is at any rate regarded by the public as property was esteemed as the first and most inviolable of all political maxims, and it was only within the limits assigned by this maxim that he sought to accomplish the elevation of the Italian small holdings, which appeared to him as a vital question for the nation Even as it was, there was much still left for him in this respect to do. Every private right, whether it was called property or designated as heritable possession, whether traceable to Gracchus or to Sulla, was unconditionally respected by him. On the other hand Caesar, after he had in his strictly economical fashion-which tolerated no waste and no negligence even on a small scale-instituted a general revision of the Italian titles to property by the revised commission of twenty (p 190), destined the whole actual domain were state' as it was fitted for agriculture; the Apulian summer and the domain: domains requisite by the purchase of Italian estates from the public funds. In the selection of the new farmers provision was naturally made first of all for the veteran soldiers, and as far as possible the burden, which the levy imposed on the mother country, was converted into a benefit by the fact that Caesar gave the proletarian, who was levied from it as a recruit, buck to it as a farmer, it is remarkable also that the desolate Larn communities, such as Ven and Capena, seem to have been especially provided with new colonists. The regulation of Caesar that the new owners should not be entitled to aliena'e the lands received by them till after twenty years, was a happy medium between the full bestoral of the right of alienation, which would have brought the larger portion of the distributed land speedily back into the hands of the great capitalists, and the permanent restrictions on free trade in land which Tiberus Graechus (m. 85, 91, 125) and Sulla (m. 336, 1v. 83) had eracted, both equally in vain Lastly, while the government thus energetically applied itself to remove the diseased, and to strengthen the sound, elements of the Itahan national hile, the newly-regulated material system—which had but recently developed itself out of the crisis of the Social War in and alongside of the state-economy (iii. 354)—was intended to communicate to the new absolute monarchy the communal life which was compatible with it, and to impart to the sluggish circulation of the noblest elements of public life once more a quickened action. The leading principles in the two municipal ordinances issued in 705 for Cisalpine Gaul and in 705 for Italy, the latter of which remained the fundamental law for all succeeding times, are apparently, first, the strict purifying of the urban corporations from all immoral elements, while yet no trace of political police occurs; secondly, the utmost restriction of centralisation and the utmost freedom of movement in the communities, to which there was even now reserved the election of magistrates and a limited civil and criminal jurisdiction. The general police enactments, such as the restrictions on the right of association (p. 475), came, it is true, into operation also here.

&lt;sup>1</sup> At least the latter rule occurs in the old Egyptian royal laws (Diodorus, i. 79). On the other hand the Solonian legislation knows no restrictions on interest, but on the contrary expressly allows interest to be fixed of any amount at pleasure.

Such were the ordinances by which Caesar attempted to reform the Italian national economy. It is easy both to show their insufficiency, seeing that they allowed a multitude of evils still to exist, and to prove that they operated in various respects injuriously by imposing restrictions, some of which were very severely felt, on freedom of trade. It is still easier to show that the evils of the Italian national economy generally were incurable. But in spite of this the practical statesman will admire the work as well as the master-workman. It was no small achievement, that in circumstances where a man like Sulla, despairing of remedy, had contented himself with a mere formal reorganisation, the evil was seized in its proper seat and grappled with there; and we may well conclude that Caesar with his reforms came as near to the measure of what was possible as it was given to a statesman and a Roman to come, He could not and did not expect from them the regeneration of Italy; but he sought on the contrary to attain this in a very different way, for the right apprehension of which it is necessary first of all to review the condition of the provinces as Caesar found them.

The provinces, which Caesar found in existence, were fourteen in number: seven European—the Further and the Hither Spain, Transalpine Gaul, Italian Gaul with Illyricum, Macedonia with Greece, Sicily, Sardinia with Corsica; five Asiatic —Asia, Bithynia and Pontus, Cilicia with Cyprus, Syria, Crete; and two African—Cyrene and Africa. To these Caesar added

&lt;sup>1</sup> Of both laws considerable fragments still exist.

502 were a draft on the governor and a title accordingly to return

like manner, the able members of u be a control with the advocates nicely, for they had in fact to share the spoil with the advocates and the jurymen, and the more they stole, they did so the more securely The notion of honour in theft too was already securely the hor robber looked down on the little and the sums which he was proved to the t the provinces of the successors of those men who

HALLO DU

But still worse, if possible, and still less subject to any control their fellow citizens was the havoc committed by the Italian men of business among the unhappy provincials. The most lucrative portions of the landed property and the whole commercial and monetary business in the provinces were concentrated in their hands The estates in the transmarine regions, which belonged to Italian grandees, were exposed to all the misery of management by stewards, and never saw their owner, excepting possibly the hunting parks, which occur as early as this time in Trans alpine Gaul with an area amounting to nearly twenty square miles Usury flourished as it had never flourished before The small landowners in Illyricum, Asia, and Egypt managed their estates even in Varios time in breat part practically as the debtor slaves of their Roman or non Roman creditors, just as the plebenans in former days for their patneran lords Cases occurred of capital being lent even to urban communities in tour per cent per month. It was no unusual thing for an energetic and influential man of business to get either the title of envoy 2 given to him by the senate or that of off cer by the governor, and, if possible to have men put at his service for the better prosecution of his affirms, a case is narrated on credible authority, where one of these horourable martial bankers on account of a claim against the town of Salamis in Cyprus Lept its municipal council blockaded in the town house, until five of the members had died of hunger 1 This is the so-called free embasty (liters legate) namely an embasty without any proper pubbe errand

To these two modes of oppression, each of which by itself was intolerable and which were always becoming better arranged to work into each other's hands, were added the general calamities, for which the Roman government was also in great part, at least indirectly, responsible. In the various wars a large amount of capital was dragged away from the country and a larger amount destroyed sometimes by the barbarians, sometimes by the Roman armies. Owing to the worthlessness of the Roman land and maritime police, brigands and pirates swarmed everywhere. In Sardinia and the interior of Asia Minor brigandage was endemic; in Africa and Further Spain it became necessary to fortify all buildings constructed outside of the city-enclosures with walls and towers. The fearful evil of piracy has been already described in another connection (p. 37). The panaceas of the prohibitive system, with which the Roman governor was wont to interpose when scarcity of money or dearth occurred, as under such circumstances they could not fail to do—the prohibition of the export of gold or grain from the province—did not mend the matter. The communal affairs were almost everywhere embarrassed, in addition to the general distress, by local disorders and frauds of the public officials.

Where such grievances afflicted communities and individuals not temporarily but for generations with an inevitable, steady, and yearly-increasing oppression, the best regulated public and private economy could not but succumb to them, and the most unspeakable misery could not but extend over all the nations from the Tagus to the Euphrates. "All the communities," it is said in a treatise published as early as 6,84, "are ruined;" the same truth is specially attested as regards Spain and Narbonese Gaul, the very provinces which, comparatively speaking, were still in the most tolerable economic position. In Asia Minor even towns like Samos and Halicarnassus stood almost empty; legal slavery seemed here a haven of rest compared with the torments to which the free provincial succumbed, and even the patient Asiatic had become, according to the descriptions of Roman statesmen themselves, weary of life. Any one who desires to fathom the depths to which man can sink in the criminal infliction, and in the no less criminal endurance, of all conceivable injustice, may altogether from the criminal records of this period the wrongs which Roman grandees could perpetrate and Greeks, Syrians, and Phoenicians could suffer. Even the statesmen of Rome herself publicly and frankly conceded that the Roman name was unutterably odious through all Greece and Asna, and, when the burgesses of the Pontue Heraclea on one occasion put to death the whole of the Roman tax-collectors, the only matter for regret was that such things did not occur oftener

The Optumates scoffed at the new master who went in person to inspect his "farms" one after the other, in reality the condition of the several provinces demanded all the curiest ness and oil the wisdom of one of those rare men, who redeem the name of king from being regarded by the nations as merely a conspicuous example of human insufficiency. The wounds inflicted had to be healed by time, Caesar took care that they might be so healed, and that there should be no firsh inflictions.

The system of odministration was thoroughly remodelled The Sullan proconsuls and propraetors had been in their pro vinces essentially sovereign and practically subject to no control those of Caesar were the well-disciplined servants of a stern master, who from the very unity and life tenure of his por cr sustained a more natural and more tolerable relation to the subjects than those numerous, onnually changing, petty tyrants The governorships were no doubt still distributed among the annually retiring two consuls and sixteen practors, but, as the Imperator directly nominated eight of the latter and the dis tribution of the provinces omong the competitors depended solely on him (p 453), they were in reality bestowed by the Imperator The functions also of the governors were prictcally restricted. The superintendence of the administration of justice and the odministrative control of the communities remoined in their honds, but their command was paralised by the new supreme command in Rome and its adjutants associated with the governor (p 461), and the raising of the taxes was probably even now committed in the provinces substantially to imperial officials (p 453), so that the governor was thenceforward surrounded with an ouxiliary staff which was absolutely dependent on the Imperator in virtue either of the laws of the military hierarchy or of the still stricter laws of domestic discipline. While Intherto the proconsul and his quaestor had opposted as if they were members of a garg of robbers despatched to levy contributions, the magnificates of Caesar were present to protect the weak against the strong and, instead of the previous worse than useless control of the equestrian or senatorian tribunals, they had to answer for ther selves ot the bar of o just and unrelenting monarch The Liw

as to exactions, the enactments of which Caesar had already in his first consulate made more stringent, was applied by him against the chief commandants in the provinces with an inexorable severity going even beyond its letter; and the tax-officers, if indeed they ventured to indulge in an injustice, atoned for it to their master, as slaves and freedmen according to the cruel domestic law of that time were wont to atone.

The extraordinary public burdens were reduced to the right proportion and the actual necessity; the ordinary burdens were materially lessened. We have already mentioned the comprehensive regulation of taxation (p. 466); the extension of the exemptions from tribute, the general lowering of the direct taxes, the limitation of the system of decumae to Africa and Sardinia, the complete setting aside of middlemen in the collection of the direct taxes, were most beneficial reforms for the provincials. That Caesar after the example of one of his greatest democratic predecessors, Sertorius (p. 20), wished to free the subjects from the burden of quartering troops and to insist on the soldiers erecting for themselves permanent encampments resembling towns, cannot indeed be proved; but he was, at least, after he had exchanged the part of pretender for that of king, not the man to abandon the subject to the soldier; and it was in keeping with his spirit, when the heirs of his policy created such military camps, and then converted them into towns which formed rallying-points for Italian civilisation amidst the barbarian frontier districts.

It was a task far more difficult than the checking of official irregularities, to deliver the provincials from the oppressive ascendancy of Roman capital: Its power could not be directly broken without applying means which were still more dangerous than the evil; the government could for the time being abolish only isolated abuses—as when Caesar for instance prohibited the employment of the title of state-envoy for financial purposes -and meet manifest acts of violence and palpable usury by a sharp application of the general penal laws and of the laws as to usury, which extended also to the provinces (p. 496); but a more radical cure of the evil was only to be expected from the reviving prosperity of the provincials under a better administration. Temporary enactments, to relieve the insolvency of particular provinces, had been issued on several occasions in recent times. Caesar himself had in 694 when governor of Further Spain assigned to the creditors two-thirds of the income of their debtors in order to pay themselves from that source.

ancy, as is indicated in the very fact that he issued all his enactments in Latin, although those destined for the Greekspeaking countries were at the same time issued in Greek. In general he arranged the relations of the two great nations in his monarchy just as his republican predecessors had arranged them in the united Italy, the Hellenic nationality was pro-tected where it existed, the Italian was extended as far as circumstances permitted, and the inheritance of the races to be absorbed was destined for it. This was necessary, because an entire equalising of the Greek and Latin elements in the state would in all probability have in a very short time occa sioned that catastrophe which Byzantinism brought about several centuries later, for the Greek element was superior to the Roman not merely in all intellectual aspects, but also in the measure of its predominance, and it had within Italy itself in the hosts of Hellenes and half Hellenes who migrated com pulsorily or voluntarily to Italy an endless number of spostles apparently insignificant, but whose influence could not be estimated too highly To mention only the most conspicuous phenomenon in this respect, the rule of Greek lackeys over the Roman monarchs is as old as the monarchy The first in the equally long and repulsive list of these personages is the con fidential servant of Pomperus, Theophanes of My tilene, who he his power over his weak master contributed probably more than any one else to the outbreak of the war between Pompens and Caesar Not wholly without reason he was after his death treated with divine honours by his countrymen, he commenced, forsooth, the talet de chambre government of the imperial period, which in a certain measure was just a dominion of the Helleres The government had accordingly every over the Romans reason not to encourage by its direct action the extension of Hellenism at least in the West, but the Greek element, wi erever it existed, was preserved and protected. However political crises might suggest to the Imperator the demolition of the strong pillars of Hellenism in the West and in Egypt, Massilia and Alexandria were neither destroyed nor denationalised Sicily was not simply relieved of the presence of the decumer hut had its communities invested with Latin rights, which was probably meant to be followed in due time by full equalita's with Italy, Caesar's design beyond doubt was rot to Lating Sicily, but to attach that glorious island-which nature has destined not so much to be an appendage to Itals, as to be the finest of its provinces—to the association of the Iralian a.

munities, under retention of its Hellenic nationality, just like Neapolis and Rhegium.

On the other hand the Roman element was promoted by the government through colonisation and Latinising with all vigour and at the most various points of the kingdom. The principle, which originated no doubt from a bad combination of formal law and brute force, but was inevitably necessary in order to deal freely with the nations destined to destruction—that all the soil in the provinces not ceded by special act of the government to communities or private persons was the property of the state, and the holder of it for the time being had merely an heritable possession on sufferance and revocable at any time—was retained by Caesar and raised by him from a democratic party-theory to a fundamental principle of monarchical law.

Gaul, of course, fell to be primarily dealt with in the extension of Roman nationality. Cisalpine Gaul obtained throughoutwhat a great part of the inhabitants had long enjoyed—political equalisation with the leading country by the admission of the Transpadane communities into the Roman burgess-union, which had for long been assumed by the democracy as accomplished (pp. 4, 293) and was now  $\binom{70b}{49}$  finally accomplished by Caesar. Practically this province had already completely Latinised itself during the forty years which had elapsed since the bestowal of Latin rights. The exclusives might ridicule the broad and gurgling accent of the Celtic Latin, and miss "an undefined something of the grace of the capital" in the Insubrian or Venetian, who as Caesar's legionary had conquered for himself with his sword a place in the Roman Forum and even in the Roman senate. Nevertheless Cisalpine Gaul with its dense chiefly agricultural population was even before Caesar's time practically an Italian country, and remained for centuries the true asylum of Italian manners and Italian culture; indeed the teachers of Latin literature found nowhere else out of the capital so much encouragement and approbation.

While Cisalpine Gaul was thus substantially merged in Italy, the place which it had hitherto occupied was taken by the old Transalpine province, which had been converted by the conquests of Caesar from a frontier into an inland province, and which by its vicinity as well as by its climate was fitted beyond all other regions to become in due course of time likewise an Italian land. Thither principally, according to the old aim of the transmarine settlements of the Roman democracy, was the stream of Italian emigration directed. There the ancient colony of Narbo was reinforced by new settlers, and four new hurgescolonies were instituted at Baeterine (Beziers) not far from Narbo, at Arelate (Arles) and Arausio (Orange) on the Rhome, and at the new seaport Forum Julii (Fréjus); while the names assigned to them at the same time preserved the memory of the brave legions which had annexed northern Gaul to the empire.

cf

The townships not furnished with colonists appear, at least for the most part, to have been led on towards Romanisation in the same way as Transpadane Gaul in former times (iii. 234) by the bestowal of Latin rights; in particular Nemausus (Nimes), as the chief place of the territory taken from the Massillots in iar (p. 367), was converted i urban community, and

and even with the right of coinage. While Cisalome Gaul thus advanced from the preparatory stage to full equality with Italy, the Narbonese

In the other non-Greek and non-Latin regions of the empire, which were still more remote from the influence of Italy and the process of assimulation, Caesar confined himself to the establishment of several centres for Italian civilisation such as Narbo had hitherto been in Gaul, in order by their means to pave the way for a future complete equalisation. Such pre-tegions from which they took used many, it is a sufficient to the sufficient to the liminary foundations can be pointed out in all the provinces of the empire, with the exception of the poorest and least important of all, Sardinia. How Caesar proceeded in Northern Gaul, we have already set forth (p. 266); the Latin language obtained there general official recognition, though not yet employed for all branches of public intercourse, and the colony of Noviodunum (Nyon) arose on the Leman lake as the most northerly town with an Italian constitution.

In Spain, which was probably at that time the most densely peopled country of the Roman empire, Caesarian colonists, so far as we see, were settled only in the important Helleno-Iberian seaport town of Emporiae by the side of the old population. On the other hand the ancient and wealthy mercantile city of Gades, whose municipal system Caesar even when practor had remodelled suitably to the times, now obtained from the Imperator the full rights of the Italian municipia ( $\frac{70}{40}$ ) and became—what Tusculum had been in Italy (i. 345)—the first extra-Italian community not founded by Rome which was admitted into the Roman burgess-union. Some years afterwards ( $\frac{70}{40}$ ) similar rights were conferred also on some other Spanish communities, and Latin rights probably on still more.

In Africa the project, which Gaius Gracchus had not been allowed to bring to an issue, was now carried out, and on the spot where the city of the hereditary foes of Rome had stood, 3000 Italian colonists and a great number of the tenants on lease and sufferance resident in the Carthaginian territory were settled; and the new "Venus-colony," the Roman Carthage, throve with amazing rapidity under the singularly favourable circumstances of the locality. Utica, hitherto the capital and first commercial town in the province, had already been in some measure compensated beforehand, apparently by the bestowal of Latin rights, for the revival of its superior rival. In the Numidian territory newly annexed to the empire the important Cirta and the other communities assigned to the Roman condottiere Publius Sittius for himself and his troops (p. 421) obtained the rights of Roman military colonies. The stately provincial towns indeed, with the insane fury of Juba and of the desperate remnant of the constitutional party had converted into ruins, did not revive so rapidly as they had been reduced to ashes, and many a ruinous site recalled long afterwards this fatal period; but the two new Julian colonies, Carthage and Cirta, became and continued to be the centres of Africano-Roman civilisation.

In the desolate land of Greece, Caesar, besides other plans

but a plan was projected for cutting through the isthmus, so as to avoid the dangerous circumnivigation of the Peloponnessus and to make the whole traffic between Italy and Asia pass through the Corintho-Saronic gulf Lastly, even in the remote Hellenic East the monarch called into existence Italian settlements, on the Black Sex, for instance, at Heraclea and Simope, which towns the Italian colonists shared, as in the case of Emporiace, with the old inhabitants, on the Syrain coast, in the important port of Berytins, which like Sinope obtained an Italian constitution; and even in Egypt, where a Roman station was established on the lighthouse island commanding the harbour of Alexandria

Through these ordinances the Italian municipal freedom was carried into the provinces in a manner far more comprehensive than had been previously the case. The communities of full burgesses—that is, all the towns of the Cisalpine province and the burgess colonies and burgess municipia scattered in Transalpine Gaul and elsewhere—were on an equal footing with the Italian, in so far as they administered their own affairs, and even evereused a somewhat limited jurisdiction; while on the other hand the more important processes came before the Roman authority competent to deal with them—as a rule, the governor of the province 1 The formally autonomous Latin and the other emancipated communities—including now those of Narbonese Gaul, all those of Sicily, so far as they were not of Narbonese Gaul, all those of Sicily, so far as they were not obtained to the provinces—had not merely free administration, but recessing came being and processes in such a case went cretarily to the governor concerned as indiced even from practical extel eaters the carrying of a suit to Reme could not well be thought of probably unlimited jurisdiction; so that the governor was only entitled to interfere there by virtue of his—certainly very arbitrary—administrative control. No doubt even earlier there had been communities of full burgesses within the provinces of governors, such as Aquileia, Ravenna, Narbo, and whole governors' provinces, such as Cisalpine Gaul, had consisted of communities with Italian constitution; but it was, if not in law, at least in a political point of view a singularly important innovation, that there was now a province which as well as Italy was peopled solely by Roman burgesses, and that others promised to become such.

With this disappeared the first great practical distinction that separated Italy from the provinces; and the second—that ordinarily no troops were stationed in Italy, while they were stationed in the provinces—was likewise in the course of disappearing; troops were now stationed only where there was a frontier to be defended, and the commandants of the provinces in which this was not the case, such as Narbo and Sicily, were officers only in name. The formal contrast between Italy and the provinces, which had at all times depended on other distinctions (ii. 62), continued certainly still to subsist—Italy being the sphere of the civil jurisdiction and of the consuls and praetors while the provinces were districts under the jurisdiction of martial law and subject to proconsuls and propraetors, but the procedure according to civil and according to martial law had for long been practically coincident, and the different titles of the magistrates signified little after the one Imperator was over all.

In all these various municipal foundations and ordinances—which are traceable at least in plan, if not perhaps all in execution, to Caesar—a definite system is apparent. Italy was converted from the mistress of the subject peoples into the mother of the renovated Italo-Hellenic nation. The Cisalpine province completely equalised with the mother-country was a promise and a guarantee that, in the monarchy of Caesar just as in the healthier times of the republic, every Latinised district might expect to be placed on an equal footing by the side of its elder contained of full the threshold of full the stood the adjoinrapidly becoming Latinised. In a more remote stage of preparation stood the other provinces of the empire, in which, just as hitherto in southern Gaul Narbo had been a Roman colony. the great maritime cities-Emporiae, Gades, Carthage, Corinth, Heraclea in Pontus, Sinope, Berytus, Alexandria-now became Italian or Helleno-Italian communities, the centres of an Italian civilisation even in the Greek East, the fundamental pillars of the future national and political equalisation of the empire. The rule of the urban community of Rome over the shores of the Mediterranean was at an end; in its stead came the new Mediterranean state, and its first act was to atone for the two greatest outrages which that urban community had perpetrated on civilisation. While the destruction of the two greatest marts of commerce in the Roman dominions marked the turning point at which the protectorate of the Roman community degenerated into political tyrannising over, and financial exaction from, the subject lands, the prompt and brilliant restoration of Carthage and Corinth marked the foundation of the new great commonwealth which was to train up all the regions on the Mediterranean to national and political equality, to union in a genuine state. Well might Caesar bestow on the city of Corinth in addition to its far-famed ancient name the new one of " Honour to Julius" (Lavs Jult).

&lt;sup>1</sup> It is difficult to see why the bestowal of the Roman franchise on a province collectively, and the continuance of a provincial administration for it, should be usually conceived as contrasts excluding each other. Besides, Cisalpine Gaul notoriously obtained the civitas at latest in  $\frac{70.5}{4.0}$ , while it remained a province as long as Caesar lived and was only united with Italy after his death (Dio, xlviii. 12); the governors also can be pointed out down to  $\frac{71.1}{4.0}$ . The very fact that the Caesarian ordinance never designates the country as Italy, but as Cisalpine Gaul, ought to have led to the right view.

While thus the new united empire was furnished with a national character, which doubtless necessarily lacked individuality and was rather an inanimate product of art than a fresh growth of nature, it further had need of unity in those institutions which express the general life of nations-in constitution and administration, in religion and jurisprudence, m money, measures, and weights; as to which, of course, lical diversities of the most varied character were quite compatible with essential union. In all these departments we can only speak of the initial steps, for the thorough formation of the monarchy of Caesar into an unity was the work of the fature, and all that he did was to lay the foundation for the fulliant of centuries. But of the lines, which the great man drew to these departments, several can still be recognised; and it is more pleasing to follow him here, than in the tack of recostruction from the ruins of the nationalities.

As to constitution and administration, we have already noticed eisewhere the most important elements of the new unity —the transition of the sovereignty from the municipal council of Rome to the sole master of the Mediterranean monarchy; the conversion of that municipal council into a supreme imperial council representing Italy and the provinces; above all, the transference-now commenced-of the Roman, and generally of the Italian, municipal organisation to the provincial communities. This latter course—the bestowal of Latin, and thereafter of Roman, rights on the communities ripe for full admission to the united state-gradually of itself brought about uniform communal arrangements. In one respect alone this process could not be waited for. The new empire needed immediately an institution which should place before the government at a glance the principal bases of administration—the proportions of population and property in the different communities-in other words an improved census. First the census of Italy was reformed. Hitherto, strange to say, it had been always held exclusively in the capital, to the annoyance of the burgesses and to the injury of business. According to Caesar's ordinance 1 in future, when a census took place in the Roman community, there were to be simultaneously registered by the highest authority in each Italian community the name of every municipal burgess and that of his father or manumitter, his district, his age, and his property; and these lists were to be furnished to the Roman censor early enough to enable him to complete in proper time the general list of Roman burgesses and of Roman property. That it was Caesar's intention to introduce similar institutions also in the provinces is attested partly by the measurement and survey of the whole empire ordered by him, partly by the nature of the arrangement itself; for it in fact furnished the general instrument appropriate for procuring, as well in the Italian as in the non-Italian communities of the state, the information requisite for the central administration. Evidently here too it was Caesar's intention to revert to the traditions of the earlier republican times, and to reintroduce the census of the empire, which the earlier republic had effected-essentially in the same way as Caesar effected the Italian-by analogous extension of the institution of the urban censorship with its set terms and other essential rules

&lt;sup>1</sup> That this was a change introduced by Caesar, and not possibly an enactment already made in consequence of the Social War, should never have been doubted (Cie. Verr. act. i. 18, 54 and elsewhere).

to all the subject communities of Italy and Sicily (1 418, 11.63) This had been one of the first institutions which the toroid aristocracy allowed to drop, and in this way deprived the supreme governing authority of any general view of the resources in men and taxation at its disposal and consequently of all possibility of an effective control (n 319) The indications still extant, and the very connection of things, show irrefragably that Caesar made preparations to recew the general census that had been obsolete for centuries

We oeed scarcely say that in religion and in jurisprudence oo thorough levelling could be thought of, yet with all toleration towards local faiths and municipal statutes the new state needed a common worship consonant to the Italo-Hellenic nationality and a general code of law superior to the municipal statutes It needed them, for de facto both were already in existence. In the field of religion men had for centuries been busied in fusing together the Italian and Hellenic worships partly by external adoption, partly by internal adjustment of their respective conceptions of the gods, and owing to the plant formless character of the Italian gods, there had been no great difficulty in resolving Jupiter into Zeus, Veous into Aphrodite, and so every essential idea of the Latin faith into its Helleme counterpart The Italo Hellenic religion stood forth in its outlines ready made, how much in this very department men were conscious of having gone beyond the specifically Roman point of view and advanced towards no Italo-Hellenic quasinationality, is shown by the distroction made in the already mentioned theology of Varro between the "common" gods, that is, those acknowledged by Romans and Greeks, and the

> -slice law, where e necessities of . .melition there

the case are substan was no difficulty in a that degree of mater department needful

hn 177 law again, where the mittative belongs to committee

course and merely the formal shape to the legislatur, the costs for the united empire, which the legislator certainly could no have created, had been already long since developed natural y by commercial intercourse itself. The Roman urban law was still indeed legally based on the embodiment of the Lat a national law cootained in the Twelve Tables Later laws had doubtless introduced various improvements of detail suited to the times, among which the most important was probably the abolition of the old inconvenient mode of commencing a process through standing forms of declaration by the parties (i. 154) and the substitution of an instruction to the single juryman drawn up in writing by the presiding magistrate (formula); but in the main the popular legislation had only piled upon that venerable foundation an endless chaos of special laws long since in great part antiquated and forgotten, which can only be compared to the English statutes at large. The attempts to impart to them scientific shape and system had certainly rendered the tortuous paths of the old civil law accessible, and thrown light upon them (iii. 445); but no Roman Blackstone could remedy the fundamental defect, that an urban code composed four hundred years ago with its equally diffuse and confused supplements was now to serve as the law of a great state.

Commercial intercourse provided for itself a more thorough remedy. The lively commerce between Romans and non-Romans had long ago developed in Rome an international private law (ius gentium; i. 157), that is to say, a body of maxims especially relating to commercial matters, according to which Roman judges pronounced judgment, when a cause could not be decided either according to their own or any other national code and they were compelled-setting aside the peculiarities of Roman, Hellenic, Phoenician and other lawto revert to the common perceptions of right underlying all commercial dealings. The formation of the newer law proceeded on this basis. In the first place as a standard for the legal dealings of Roman burgesses with each other, it de facto substituted for the old urban law, which had become practically useless, a new code based in substance on a compromise between the national law of the Twelve Tables and the international law or so-called law of nations. The former was essentially adhered to, though of course with modifications suited to the times, in the law of marriage, family, and inheritance; whereas in all regulations which concerned dealings with property, and consequently in reference to ownership and contracts, the international law was the standard; in these matters indeed various important arrangements were borrowed even from local provincial law, such as the legislation as to usury (p. 496), and the institution of hypotheca. Through whom, when, and how this comprehensive innovation came into existence, whether at once or gradually, whether through one or several authors, are questions to which we cannot furnish a satisfactory answer We know only that this reform, as was natural, proceeded in the free metance from the urban court, that it was first em

e of the parties in reference to the most important masa a flaw to be observed 1 ment then beginning (edictum annuum or per

only attained its completion . . . . theoretic and abstract, masmuch as the Roman view of law had therein divested itself of such of its national peculiarities as it had become aware of, but it was at the same time prictical and positive, masmuch as it by no means faded away into the dim twilight of general equity or even into the pure nothingness of the so called law of nature, but was applied by definite functionaries for definite concrete cases according to fixed rules and was not merely capable of, but had already essentially received, a statutor, embodiment in the urban edict. This code moreover corresponded in matter to the wants of the time, in so far as it furnished the more convenient forms required by the increase of commerce for legal procedure, for acquisition of property, and for conclusion of contracts Lastly, it had already in the main become subsidiary law throughout the compass of the Roman empire, masmuch as-while the manifold local statutes were retained for those legal relations which were not directly commercial, as well as for local transactions between members of the same legal district—dealings relating to property between subjects of the empire belonging to different legal districts were regulated throughout after the model of the urban edict, though not applicable de jure to these cases, both in Italy and in the provinces The law of the urban edict had thus essentially the same position in that age which the Roman law has occupied in our political development, this also is so far as s d with the positive, d tock its earlier legal coue; man - ... place by the side of the local statutes as universal auxiliary law But the Roman legal development had an essential advantame over ours in this, that the denationalised legislation appeared not, as with us, prematurely and by artificial birth, but at the right time and agreeably to nature

Such was the state of the law as Caesar found it. When he projected the plan for a new code, it is not difficult to divine his intentions. This code could only comprehend the law of Roman burgesses, and could be a general code for the empire merely so far as a code of the ruling nation suitable to the times could not but of itself become general subsidiary law throughout the compass of the empire. In criminal law, if the plan embraced this at all, there was needed only a revision and adjustment of the Sullan ordinances. In civil law, for a state whose nationality was strictly humanity, the necessary and only possible formal shape was to invest that urban edict, which had already spontaneously grown out of lawful commerce, with the security and precision of statute-law. The first step towards this had been taken by the Cornelian law of 6,7, when it enjoined the judge to keep to the maxims set forth at the beginning of his magistracy and not arbitrarily to administer other law (p. 148)—a regulation, which may well be compared with the law of the Twelve Tables, and which became almost as significant for the fixing of the latter urban law as that collection for the fixing of the earlier. But although after the Cornelian decree of the people the edict was no longer subordinate to the judge, but the judge was by law subject to the edict; and though the new code had practically dispossessed the old urban law in judicial usage as in legal instruction—every urban judge was still free at his entrance on office absolutely and arbitrarily to alter the ediet, and the law of the Twelve Tables with its additions still always outweighed formally the urban edict, so that in each individual case of collision the antiquated rule had to be set aside by arbitrary interference of the magistrate and therefore, strictly speaking, by violation of formal law. The subsidiary application of the urban edict in the court of the praetor peregrinus at Rome and in the different provincial judicatures was entirely subject to the arbitrary pleasure of the individual presiding magistrate. It was evidently necessary to set aside definitively the old urban law, so far as it had not been transferred to the newer, and in the case of the latter to set suitable limits to its arbitrary alteration by each individual urban judge, possibly also to regulate its subsidiary application by the side of the local statutes. This was Caesar's design, when he projected the plan for his code; for it could not have been otherwise. The plan was not executed; and thus that troublesome state of transition in Roman jurisprudence was perpetuated till this necessary reform was accomplished six centuries afterwards, and then but imperfectly, by one of the successors of Caesar, the emperor Justinian

Lastly, in money, measures, and weights the substantial equalisation of the Latin and Hellenic systems had long been in progress It was very ancient so far as concerned the definitions of weight and the measures of capacity and of length indispensable for trade and commerce (1 207), and in the monetary system little more recent than the introduction of the silver comage (11 358) But these older equations were not sufficient, because in the Hellenic world itself the most varied metrical and monetary systems subsisted side by side, it was necessary, and formed part doubtless of Caesar's plan, now to introduce everywhere in the new united empire, so far as this had not been done already, Roman money, Roman measures, and Roman weights in such a manner that they alone should be reckoned by in official intercourse, and that the non Roman systems should be restricted to local currency or placed in a -once for all regulated-ratio to the Roman. The action of Caesar, however, can only be pointed out in two of the most important of these departments, the monetary system and the The Roman monetary system was based on the two precious calendar

metals circulating side by side and in a fived relation to each metals circulating side by side and in a fived relation to each other, gold being given and taken according to weight, silver on the form of coin, but practically in consequence of the in the form of coin, but practically in consequence of the control of the following the form of the following the fol

the empire, is uncertain, at any ... dessentially supplied the place of imperial money throughout the Roman territory, the more so as the Romans had prohibited the country of gold in full the provinces and client states, and the desertion laid, in addition to Italy, de jure or de facto naturalised itself in Cisalpine Gaul, in Scolly, in Spain and various other places, especially in the West (in 399). But the imperial cornage begin with Caesar Exactly like Alexander, he marked the foundation of the new monarchy embracing the civilised world by the fact that the only metal forming an universal med um obvained

The gold pieces, which Sulla (iii 355) and centemperatily Percel a beautiful to the second of the sullar substitution of the s

This was probably not introduced all at once, and in part perhaps may have preceded Caesar, but it was at any rate the essential complement of the Caesarian arrangement as to the imperial comage, whose new gold piece found its immediate model in the almost equally heavy coin of Alexander and was doubtless calculated especially for circulation in the East.

Of a Lindred nature was the reform of the calendar. The republican calendar, which strangely enough was still the old decemviral calendar-an imperfect adoption of the octaeters that preceded Meton (1 466)—had by a combination of wretched mathematics and wretched administration come to anticipate the true time hy sixty-seven whole days, so that eg the festival of Flora was celebrated on the 11th July instead of the 28th April Caesar finally removed this evil, and with the help of the Greek mathematician Sosigenes introduced the Italian farmer's year regulated according to the Ecyptian calendar of Eudoxus, as well as a rational system of intercalation, into religious and official use, while at the same time the beginning of the year on the 1st March of the old calendar was abounded, and the date of the 1st January-fixed at first as the term for changing the supreme magistrates and, in consequence of this, long since predominant in civil life—was assumed as the calendar period for commencing the year Both changes came into effect on the 1st January 709 of the city, 45 n c, and along with them the use of the Julian calendar so named after its author, which long after the fall of the monarchy of Caesar remained the regulative standard of the civilised world and in the main is so still By way of explanation there was added m a detailed as a star-calendar derived from the Egyptian astronomical observations and transferred-not indeed very skilfully-to Italy, which fixed the rising and setting of the stars named necording to days of the calendar. In this domain also the Roman and Greek, worlds were thus placed on a par Such were the foundations of the Mediterranean monarchy of Caesar For the second time in Rome the social question had reached a crisis, at which the antagonums not only ap-

own by I'm

Mereover it was known even before Caesar that the se ar year of 313 work has which has girling a fishe Egypotine extender and which is peared to be, but actually were, in form of their exhibition, insoluble and, in their expression, irreconcilable. On the first occasion Rome had been saved by the fact that Italy was merged in Rome and Rome in Italy, and in the new enlarged and altered home those old antagonisms were not reconciled, but fell into abeyance. Now Rome was once more saved by the fact that the countries of the Mediterranean were merged in it or became prepared for merging; the war between the Italian poor and rich, which in the old Italy could only end with the destruction of the nation, had no longer a battle-field or a meaning in the Italy of three continents. The Latin colonies closed the gap which threatened to swallow up the Roman community in the fifth century; the deeper chasm of the seventh century was filled by the Transalpine and transmarine colonisations of Gaius Gracchus and Caesar. For Rome alone history not merely performed miracles, but also repeated its miracles, and twice cured the internal crisis, which in the state itself was incurable, by regenerating the state. There was doubtless much corruption in this regeneration; as the union of Italy was accomplished over the ruins of the Samnite and Etruscan nations, so the Mediterranean monarchy built itself on the ruins of countless states and tribes once living and vigorous; but it was a corruption out of which sprang a fresh growth, part of which remains green at the present day. What was pulled down for the sake of the new building, was merely the secondary nationalities which had long since been marked out for destruction by the levelling hand of civilisation. Caesar wherever he came forward as a destroyer, only carried out the pronounced verdict of historical development; but he protected the germs of culture, where and as he found them, in his own land as well as among the sister nation of the Hellenes. He saved and renewed the Roman element; and not only did he spare the Greek element, but with the same self-relying genius with which he accomplished the renewed foundation of Rome he undertook also the regeneration of the Hellenes, and resumed the interrupted work of the great Alexander, whose image, we may well believe, never was absent from Caesar's soul. He solved these two great tasks not merely side by side, but the one by means of the other. The two great essentials of humanity -general and individual development, or state and cultureonce in embryo united in those old Graeco-Italians feeding their flocks in primeval simplicity far from the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean, had become dissevered when these were parted into Italians and Hellenes, and had thenceforth remained apart for many centuries. Now the descendant of the Trojan prince and the Latin king's daughter created out of a state without distinctive culture and a cosmopolitan civilisation a new whole, in which state and culture again met together at the acme of human existence in the rich fulness of blessed maturity and worthily filled the sphere appropriate to such an union

The outlines have thus been set forth, which Caesar drew for this work, according to which he laboured himself, and according to which posterity-for many centuries confined to the paths which this great man marked out-endeavoured to prosecute the work, if not with the intellect and energy, yet on the whole in accordance with the intentions, of the illusthous master Little was finished, much was merely begun Whether the plan was complete, those who venture to sie in thought with such a man may decide, we observe no material defect in what hes before us-every single stone of the building enough to make a man immortal, and yet all combining to form one harmonious whole Caesar ruled as Ling of Rome for five years and a half, not half as long as Alexander, in the intervals of seven great campaigns, which allowed him to stay not more than fifteen months altogether 1 in the capital of his empire, he regulated the destinies of the world for the present and the future, from the establishment of the boundary line between civilisation and barbarism down to the removal of the rain pools in the streets of the capital, and yet retained time composure enough attentively to follow the prize p eces composure enough attentively to follow the price per in the theatre and to confer the chaplet on the victor with improvised verses. The rapidity and precision with which the plan was executed prove that it had been long meditared thoroughly and all its parts settled in detail, but, even thus, they remain not much less wonderful than the plan list! The outlines were land down and thereby the new state was defend for all coming time, the boundless future alone could complete the structure. So far Caesar might say, that his object was attuned, and this was probably the meaning of the world which were sometimes heard to fall from him—that let lail liked long enough. But precisely because the building was an endless one, the master as long as he lived restlessly added stone to stone, with always the same dexterity and always the same elasticity busy at his work, without ever overturning or altering, just as if there were for him merely a to-day and no to-morrow. Thus he worked and created as never any mortal did before or after him; and as a worker and creator he still, after wellnigh two thousand years, lives in the memory of the nations—the first, and the unique, Imperator Caesar.

<sup>1</sup> Caesar stayed in Rome in April and Dec 100 cast on fr a lew days from Sopt to Dec. 107 some four months in the summon of the year of fifteen months 100 and from Oct 100 to March 100.

CHAPTER XII

RELIGION, CULTURE, LITERATURE, AND ART

In the development of religion and philosophy no new element appeared during this epoch. The Romano Hellenic statereligion and the Stoic state-philosophy inseparably combined with it were not merely a convenient instrument for every govern ment-oligarchy, democracy, or monarchy-but altegether in dispensable, because it was just as impossible to construct the state wholly without religious elements as to discover any new state-religion adapted to form a substitute for the old So the besom of revolution swept doubtless at times very roughly through the cobwebs of the augural bird lore (p. 190), nevertheless the rotten machine creaking at every joint survived the earthquake which swillowed up the republic itself, and preserved its insipidity and its arrogance without diminution for transference to the new monarch. As a matter of course, it fell more and more into disfavour with all those who manifested freedom of judgment. Towards the state-religion indeed public opinion maintained an attitude essentially indifferent, it was on all sides recognised as an institution of political conveniere", and no one specially troubled himself about it with the exception of political and antiquarian literati. But towards its pliksophical sister there gradually sprang up among the unit judiced public that hostility, which the empty and ver per la 3 hypocrist of set phrases never fails in the long run to awake That a presentiment of its own worthlessness began to dawn on the Stoa itself is shown by its attempt artificially to infare nto itself some fresh spirit in the was of syncretism . Anti-chasef Ascalon (flourishing about 4) who professed to have ami gurnated the Stoic and Platonic-Aristote'ian systems into coorganic units, in reality so far succeeded that his medapor doctrine became the fashionable philosophy of the consensations of his time and was conscient outh studied by the gentrel diletranti and literati of Rome Every on who day and intellectual vigour, opposed the Stea er in rel it. It is principally antipathy towards the boas ful and time me Prousa Pharises, coupled doubtless with the increasing dispersed to take refuge from practical life in indolent apathy or empty irony, that occasioned during this epoch the extension of the system of Epicurus to a larger circle and the naturalisation of the Cynic philosophy of Diogenes in Rome. However stale and poor in thought the former might be, a philosophy, which did not seek the way to wisdom through an alteration of traditional terms but contented itself with those in existence, and throughout recognised only the perceptions of sense as true, was always better than the terminological jingle and the hollow conceptions of the Stoic wisdom; and the Cynic philosophy was of all the philosophical systems of the times in so far by much the best, as its system was confined to the having no system at all, and sneering at all systems and all systematisers. both fields war was waged against the Stoa with zeal and success; for serious men, the Epicurean Lucretius preached with the full accents of heartfelt conviction and of holy zeal against the Stoical faith in the Gods and Providence and the Stoical doctrine of the immortality of the soul; for the great public ready to laugh, the Cynic Varro hit the mark still more sharply with the flying darts of his extensively-read satires. While thus the ablest men of the older generation made war on the Stoa, the vounger generation again, such as Catullus, stood in no inward relation to it at all, and passed a far sharper censure on it by completely ignoring it.

528

But, if in the present instance a faith no longer believed was maintained out of political convenience, they amply made up for this in other respects. Unbelief and superstition, different hues of the same historical phenomenon, went in the Roman world of that day hand in hand, and there was no lack of individuals who in themselves combined both-who denied the gods with Epicurus, and yet prayed and sacrificed before every shrine. Of course only the gods that came from the East were still in vogue, and, as the men continued to flock from the Greek lands to Italy, so the gods of the East migrated in ever-increasing numbers to the West. The importance of the Phrygian cultus at that time in Rome is shown both by the polemical tone of the older men such as Varro and Lucretius, and by the poetical glorification of it in the fashionable Catullus, which concludes with the characteristic request that the goddess may deign to turn the heads of others only, and not that of the poet himself.

A fresh addition was the Persian worship, which is said to have first reached the Occidentals through the medium of the

the more distant Alexandria, especially celebrated as the seat of the exact sciences, was far more rarely the point whither young men desirous of culture directed their travels.

The progress of Latin instruction was similar to the Greek, This in part resulted from the mere reflex influence of the Greek, from which it in fact essentially borrowed its methods and its stimulants. Moreover, the state of politics, the impulse to ascend the orator's platform in the Forum which the democratic agitation communicated to a daily enlarging circle, contributed not a little to the diffusion and increase of oratorical exercises; "wherever one casts his eyes," says Cicero, "every place is full of rhetoricians." Besides, the writings of the sixth century, the farther they receded into the past, began to be more decidedly regarded as classical texts of the golden time of Latin literature, and thereby gave a greater preponderance to the instruction which was essentially concentrated upon them, Lastly, the immigration and spreading of barbarian elements from many quarters and the incipient Latinising of extensive Celtic and Spanish districts, naturally gave to Latin grammar and Latin instruction a higher importance than they could have had, so long as Latium alone spoke Latin; the teacher of Latin literature had from the outset a different position in Comum and Narbo than he had in Praeneste and Ardea. Yet the aggregate result was a falling off rather than an improvement of culture. The ruin of the Italian country towns, the extensive intrusion of foreign elements, the political, economic, moral deterioration of the nation, above all, the distracting moral deterioration of the nation, above all, the distracting fivil wars inflicted more injury on the language than all the schoolmasters of the world could repair. The closer contact was a substant of the present, the more decided in the could be school the heteric and of the heteric and the heteric and of the heteric and the heteric an revied applauded the well and

shows that the mangat .... the reflection of scholastic training was becoming on possession of a daily widening circle. But at the same time

contemporaries capable of judging complain that the Hellenic culture in Italy about 600 was at a far lower level than it had been a generation before; that opportunities of hearing pure and good Latin were but rare, and these chiefly from the mouth of elderly cultivated ladies; that the tradition of genuine culture, the good old Latin mother wit, the Lucilian polish, the cultivated circle of readers of the Scipionic age were gradually disappearing. The circumstance that the term urbanilas, and the idea of a polished national culture which it expressed, arose during this period, proves, not that it was in the ascendant, but that it was on the wane, and that people were keenly alive to the absence of this urbanitas in the language and the habits of the Latinised barbarians or barbarised Latins. Where we still meet with the urbane tone of conversation, as in Varro's Satires and Cicero's Letters, it is an echo of the old fashion which was not yet so obsolete in Reate and Arpinum as in Rome.

Thus the previous culture of youth remained substantially unchanged, except that—not so much from its own deterioration as from the general decline of the nation-it was productive of less good and more evil than in the preceding epoch. Caesar initiated a revolution also in this department. While the Roman senate had first combated and then at the most had simply tolerated culture, the government of the new Italo-Hellenic empire, whose essential character in fact was humanitas, could not but adopt measures to stimulate it after the Hellenic fashion. If Caesar conferred the Roman franchise on all teachers of the liberal sciences and all the physicians of the capital, we may discover in this step a paving of the way in some degree for those institutions in which subsequently the higher bilingual culture of the youth of the empire was provided for on the part of the state, and which form the most significant expression of the new state of humanitas; and if Caesar had further resolved on the establishment of a public Greek and Latin library in the capital and had already nominated the most learned Roman of the age, Marcus Varro, as principal librarian, this implied unmistakably the design of opening up the cosmopolitan monarchy to cosmopolitan literature.

The development of the language during this period turned on the distinction between the classical Latin of cultivated society and the vulgar language of common life. The former itself was a product of the distinctively Italian culture; even in the Scipionic circle "pure Latin" had become the cue, and the mother tongue was spoken, no longer in entire naïveté, but in conscious contradistinction to the language of the great multitude This epoch opens with a remarkable reaction against the classicism which had hitherto exclusively prevailed in the higher language of conversation and accordingly also in literature-a reaction which had inwardly and outwardly a close connection with the reaction of a similar nature in Gre-ce Just about this time the rhetor and romance-writer Hegesias of Magnesia and the numerous rhetors and literati of Asia Minor who attached themselves to him began to rebel against the orthodox Atticism They demanded full recognition for the language of life, without distinction, whether the word or the phrase originated in Attica or in Caria and Phrygia, they them selves spoke and wrote not for the taste of learned cliques, but for that of the great public. There could be no reasonable dispute as to the principle, but certainly the result could not be better than was the public of Asia Minor of that day, which had totally lost the taste for chasteness and purity of production, and longed only after the show, and brilliant. To say nothing of the spurious forms of art that sprang out of this tendency -especially the romance and the history assuming the form of romance—the very style of these Asiatics was, as may readily be conceived, abrupt and without modulation and finish, mineed and effeminate, full of tinsel and hombast, thoroughly vulgar and affected, "any one who knows Hegesias," says Cicero, knows what sillness is"

Yet this new style found its way also into the Latin world. When the Hellenie fashionable rhetoric, after having at the close of the previous epoch obtinded into the Latin instruction of youth (iii. 416), took at the beginning of the present period the final step and mounted the Roman ristia in the perion of Quintus Hortensius ($132-\frac{15}{2}\frac{1}{2}\frac

4.0

This was of great importation of the state o

Hortensius thus dislodged classicism from the Roman platform and partly also from literature. But the fashion soon changed once more in Greece and in Rome. In the former it was the Rhodian school of rhetoricians, which, without reverting to all the chaste severity of the Attic style, attempted to strike out a middle course between it and the modern fashion: if the Rhodian masters were not too particular as to the internal correctness of their thinking and speaking, they at least insisted on purity of language and style, on the careful selection of words and phrases, and the thorough modulation of sentences.

In Italy it was Marcus Tullius Cicero (648-711) who, after having in his early youth gone along with the Hortensian manner, was brought by hearing the Rhodian masters and by his own more matured taste to better paths, and thenceforth addicted himself to strict purity of language and the thorough periodic arrangement and modulation of his discourse. The models of language, which in this respect he followed, he found especially in those circles of the higher Roman society which had suffered but little or not at all from vulgarism; and, as was already said, there were still such, although they were beginning to disappear. The earlier Latin and the good Greek literature, however considerable was the influence of the latter, more especially on the rhythm of his oratory, were in this matter only of secondary moment: this purifying of the language was by no means a reaction of the language of books against that of conversation, but a reaction of the language of the really cultivated against the jargon of spurious and partial culture. Caesar, in the department of language also the greatest master of his time, expressed the fundamental idea of Roman classicism, when he enjoined that in speech and writing every foreign word should be avoided, as rocks are avoided by the mariner; the poetical and the obsolete word of the older literature was rejected as well as the rustic phrase or that borrowed from the language of common life, and more especially the Greek words and phrases which, as the letters of this period show, had to a very great extent found their way into conversational language. Nevertheless this scholastic and artificial classicism of the Ciceronian period stood to the Scipionic as repentance to innocence, or the French of the classicists under Napoleon to the model French of Molière and Boileau; while the former classicism had sprung out of the full freshness of life, the latter as it were caught just in right time the last breath of a race perishing beyond recovery. Such as it was, it rapidly diffused

M.—IV

With the leadership of the bar the dictatorship of language and taste passed from Hortensius to Cicero, and the varied and copious authorship of the latter gave to this classicism -what it had hitherto lacked-extensive prose texts. Thus Cicero became the creator of the modern classical Latin prose, and Roman classicism attached itself throughout and altogether to Cicero as a stylist, it was to the stylist Cicero, not to the author, still less to the statesman, that the extravagant panegyrics-yet not made up wholk of verbiage-applied, with which the most gifted representatives of classicism, such as Caesar and Catullus, loaded him

They soon went farther What Cicero did in prose, was carried out in poetry towards the end of the epoch by the new Roman school of poets which modelled itself on the Greek fashionable poetry, and in which the man of most considerable talent was Catulius Here too the higher language of conversa tion dislodged the archaic reminiscences which hitherto to a large extent prevailed in this domain, and as Latin proce submitted to the Attic rhythm so Latin poetry submitted gradually to the strict or rather painful metrical laws of the Alexandrines, 1 --- allowable at once to eg · verse preced begi

ie not specially mg

At length science stepped in, fixed the law of language, and developed its rule, a hich was no longer determined by experience, but asserted the claim to determine experience. The endings of declension, which hitherto had in part been variable, were now to be once for all fixed, eg of the genitive and dative forms hitherto current side by side in the so-called fourth declension (senatus and senatus, seratus and seratu) Caesar recognised exclusively as valid the contracted forms (ur and u) In orthography various changes were made, to bring the written more fully into correspondence with the spoken language thus the u in the middle of words like maximus was replace? after Caesar's precedent by a, and of the two letters which had become superfluous k and q, the removal of the first was effected, and that of the second was at least proposed. The language was, if not yet stereotyped in the course of becoming so, it was to yet indeed passively dominated by the rule, but it had already become conscious of its influence. That this action in the department of Latin grammar iterived generally its spant and method from the Greek, and not only so, but that the Lat a language was also directly rectified in accordance with Greek precedent, is shown, for example, by the treatment of the final s, which till towards the close of this epoch had received at pleasure sometimes the value of a consonant, sometimes that of a vowel, but was treated by the new-fashioned poets throughout, as in Greek, as a consonantal termination. This regulation of language is the proper domain of Roman classicism; in the most various ways, and for that very reason all the more significantly, the rule is inculcated and the offence against it rebuked by the coryphaci of classicism, by Cicero, by Caesar, even in the poems of Catullus; whereas the older generation expresses itself with natural keenness of feeling respecting the revolution which had affected the field of language as remorselessly as the field of politics.\(^1\) But while the new classicism—that is to say, the standard Latin governed by rule and as far as possible placed on a parity with the standard Greek-which arose out of a conscious reaction against the vulgarism intruding into higher society and even into literature, acquired literary fixity and systematic shape, the latter by no means evacuated the field. Not only do we find it naïvely employed in the works of second-ary personages who have drifted into the ranks of authors merely by accident, as in the account of Caesar's second Spanish war, but we shall meet it also with an impress more or less distinct in literature proper, in the mime, in the semi-romance, in the aesthetic writings of Varro; and it is a significant circumstance, that it maintains itself precisely in the most national departments of literature, and that truly conservative men, like Varro, take it into protection. Classicism was based on the death of the Italian language as monarchy on the decline of the Italian nation; it was completely consistent that the men, in whom the republic was still living, should continue to accord its rights to the living language, and for the sake of its comparative vitality and nationality should tolerate its aesthetic defects. Thus then the linguistic opinions and tendencies of this epoch are everywhere divergent; by the side of the old-fashioned poetry of Lucretius appears the thoroughly modern poetry of Catullus, by the side of Cicero's well-modulated period stands the sentence of Varro intentionally disdaining all subdivision. The field of language likewise mirrors the distraction of the age.

In the literature of this period we are first of all struck by the outward increase, as compared with the former epoch, of literary effort in Rome. It was long since the literary activity of the Greeks flourished no more in the free atmosphere of civic independence, but only in the scientific institutions of the larger cities and especially of the courts. Left to depend on the favour and protection of the great, and dislodged from the former seats of the Muses by the extinction of the dynasties of Pergamus (??!), Cyrene (%.), Buhynia (*!), and Syria (*?) and by the waning splendour of the court of the Lagidac-moreover, since the death of Alexander the Great, necessarily cosmopolitan and at least quite as much strangers among the Egyptians and Syrians as among the Latins-the Hellenic literati began more and more to turn their eyes towards Rome. Among the host of Greek attendants with which the Roman of quality at this time surrounded himself, the philosopher, the poet, and the memoir-writer played conspicuous parts by the side of the cook, the boy-favourite, and the jester We meet with literati of note in such positions; the Epicurean Philodemus, for instance, was installed as domestic philosopher will Lucius Piso consul in "36, and occasionally edified the initiated with his clever opigrams on the coarse Epicureanum of hi patron. From all sides the most notable representatives o Greek art and science migrated in daily increasing number to Rome, where literary gains were now more abundant than anywhere else. Among those thus mentioned as settled is Rome we find the physician Asclepiades whom Ling Mithm-

&lt;sup>1</sup> Thus Varro (De R. R. i. 2) says: ab aeditimo, ut dicere didicimus a patribus nostris; ut corrigimur ab recentibus urbanis, ab aedituo.

<sup>5</sup> The dedication of the postical description of the earth which passes under the name of Seymnus is remarkable in reference to those relatives. After the poet has declared his purpose of preparing in the Leventis Menandrum neasure a sketch of grography intel felible for schotars Adv eary to be learned by heart, he dedicate—as Apoliudenus dedica ed his similar historical compendum to Attalus Philadelplus king at Fergama.

άθδρατον άπονθμοντα δίξαν 'Αττά Ψ Τητ πραγματείας έπιγραφήν είληφόνου

his manual to Nicomedes III king ("12 2-73") of Bithyn's

the distance, date, along peoples plan participe generating a peoplest wifer partitioned acts of course latter all apprecions and at participation of the typepoless eighborn (lightfairs the tables along the lightfairs the latelline should be able to all typepoless below as weapon up to each layer by a very plan to a pulpather as a very plant.

dates vainly endeavoured to draw away from thence into his service; the universalist in learning, Alexander of Miletus, termed Polyhistor; the poet Parthenius from Nicaea in Bithynia; Posidonius of Apamea in Syria equally celebrated as a traveller, teacher, and author, who at a great age migrated in <sup>703</sup> from Rhodes to Rome; and various others. A house like that of Lucius Lucullus was a seat of Hellenic culture and a rendezvous for Hellenic literati almost like the Alexandrian Museum; Roman resources and Hellenic connoisseurship had gathered in these halls of wealth and science an incomparable collection of statues and paintings of earlier and contemporary masters, as well as a library as carefully selected as it was magnificently fitted up, and every person of culture and especially every Greek was welcome there—the master of the house himself was often seen walking up and down the beautiful colonnade in philological or philosophical conversation with one of his learned guests. No doubt these Greeks brought along with their rich treasures of culture their preposterousness and servility to Italy; one of these learned wanderers for instance, the author of the "Art of Flattery," Aristodemus of Nysa (about 700) recommended himself to his masters by demonstrating that Homer was a native of Rome!

In the same measure as the pursuits of the Greek literati prospered in Rome, literary activity and literary interest increased among the Romans themselves. Even Greek composition, which the stricter taste of the Scipionic age had totally set aside, now revived. The Greek language was now universally current, and a Greek treatise found a quite different public from a Latin one; therefore Romans of rank, such as Lucius Lucullus, Marcus Cicero, Titus Atticus, Quintus Scaevola (tribune of the people in 700), like the kings of Armenia and Mauretania, published occasionally Greek prose and even Greek verses. Such Greek authorship however by native Romans remained a secondary matter and almost an amusement; the literary as well as the political parties of Italy all coincided in adhering to their Italian nationality, only more or less pervaded by Hellenism. Nor could there be any complaint at least as to want of activity in the field of Latin authorship. There was a flood of books and pamphlets of all sorts, and above all of poems, in Rome. Poets swarmed there, as they did only in Tarsus or Alexandria; poetical publications had become the standing juvenile sin of livelier natures, and even then the writer was reckoned fortunate whose youthful poems compassionate oblivion withdrew from criticism. Any one who understood the art, wrote without difficulty at a sitting his five hundred hexameters in which no schoolmaster found anything to censure, but no reader discovered anything to praise. The female world also took a lively part in these literary pursuits, maiden's heart, the beleaguered fortress not unfrequently capitulated likewise in graceful verses Rhythms became more and more the fashionable plaything of the big children of both sexes, poetical epistles, joint poetical exercises and competitions among good friends, were of common occurrence, and towards the end of this epoch institutions were already opened in the capital, at which unfledged Latin poets might learn verse-making for money In consequence of the large consumption of books the machinery for the manufacture of copies was substantially perfected, and publication was effected with comparative rapidity and cheapness, bookselling became a respectable and lucrative trade, and the bookseller's shop a usual meeting place of men of culture Reading had become a fashion, nay a mania, at table, where coarser pastimes had not already intruded, reading was regularly introduced, and any on- who meditated a journey seldom forgot to pack up a travelling library The superior officer was seen in the camp-test with the obscene Greek romance, the statesman in the senate with the philosophical treatise, in his finnds Matters accordingly stood in the Roman state as they have stood and will stard in every state where the citizens read ' from the threshold to the closet' The Parthian vizier was not far wrong, when he pointed out to the citizens of Seleucia the romances found in the camp of Crassus, and asked them whether they s'ill regarded the read-rs of such books as formidable opponents of such fooks as formation opponents.

541

The literary tendency of this age was varied and could not be otherwise, for the age itself was divided between the old and the nen modes. The same tendencies which came in conflict on the field of politics, the national Italian tendency of the conservatives, the Hellemo-Italian or, if the term to preferred, cosmopolitan tendency of the new monarchy, to give their battles also on the field of literature. The forever at a long itself to the older Latin literature, which in the thearm, in the school, and in crudite research assumed more and more the character of classical. With fees tast's and stronger party.

tendencies than the Scipionic epoch showed, Ennius, Pacuvius, and especially Plautus were now exalted to the skies. The leaves of the Sibyl rose in price, the fewer they became; the relatively greater nationality and relatively greater productiveness of the poets of the sixth century were never more vividly felt than in this epoch of finished Epigonism, which in literature as decidedly as in politics looked up to the century of the Hanni-balic warriors as to the golden age that had now unhappily passed away beyond recall. No doubt there was in this admiration of the old classics no small portion of the same hollowness and hypocrisy which are characteristic of the conservatism of this age in general; and here too there was no want of trimmers. Cicero for instance, although in prose one of the chief representatives of the modern tendency, revered nevertheless the older national poetry nearly with the same antiquarian respect which he paid to the aristocratic constitution and the augural discipline; "patriotism requires," we find him saying, "that we should rather read a notoriously wretched translation of Sophocles than the original." While thus the modern literary tendency cognate to the democratic monarchy numbered secret adherents enough even among the orthodox admirers of Ennius, there were not wanting already bolder judges, who treated the native literature as disrespectfully as the senatorial politics. Not only did they resume the strict criticism of the Scipionic epoch and give weight to Terence only in order to condemn Ennius and still more the Ennianists, but the younger and bolder men went much farther and ventured already—though only as yet in heretical revolt against literary orthodoxy-to call Plautus a rude jester and Lucilius a bad verse-smith. This modern tendency attached itself not to the native authorship, but rather to the more recent Greek literature or the so-called Alexandrinism.

We cannot avoid saying at least so much respecting this remarkable aftergrowth of Hellenic language and art as is requisite for the understanding of the Roman literature of this and the later epochs. The Alexandrian literature was based on the decline of the pure Hellenic idiom, which from the time of Alexander the Great was superseded in daily life by an inferior jargon deriving its origin from the contact of the Macedonian dialect with various Greek and barbarian tribes; or, to speak more accurately, the Alexandrian literature sprang out of the ruin of the Hellenic nation generally, which had to perish, and did perish, in its national individuality in order to establish the universal monarchy of Alexander and the empire of Hellenism. Had Alexander's universal empire continued to subsist, the former national and popular literature would have been succeeded by a cosmopolitan literature Hellenic merely in name, essentially denationalised and called into life in a certain measure by royal patronage, but at all events ruling the world; but, as the state of Alexander was unlanged by his death, the germs of the literature corresponding to it rapidly perished. Nevertheless the Greek nation with all that it had possessed-with its nationality, its language, its art—belonged to the past. It was only in a comparatively narrow circle not of men of culture -for such, strictly speaking, no longer existed-but of men of erudition that the Greek literature was still cherished even when dead; that the rich inheritance which it had left was inventoried with melancholy pleasure or and refinement of research; and that the living sense of sympathy or the dead erudition was elevated into a semblance of productiveness. This posthumous productiveness constitutes the so-called Alexandrinum. It is essentially similar to that literature of scholars, which, Leeping aloof from the living Romanic nationalities and their vulgar idioms, grew up during the fifteenth and sixteenth centures is doubtless less strongly marked, but is not, properly speaking, different from that between the Latin of Manutius and the

Italian of Macchiavelli.

Italy had hitherto been in the main disinclined towards Alexandrinism. Its season of comparative brilliance was the period shortly before and after the first Punic war; yet Naestan, Ennius, Pacuvius and generally the whole body of the national Roman authors down to Varro and Lucretius in all branches of poetical production, not excepting even the didactic poem, attached themselves, not to their Greek contemporaries or very recent predecessors, but without exception to Homer, Lumpides, Menander and the other masters of the living and national Greek literature. Roman literature was never fresh and national; but, as long as there was a Roman prople, its a ithors instructively sought for living and national models, and copied. if not always to the best purpose or the best authors, at least such as were original. The Greek literature which sprang up after Alexander found its first mutators-for the slight attempts of the Marian age (in, 435) can scarrely be taken into account

among the contemporaries of Cicero and Caesar; and now the Roman Alexandrinism spread with singular rapidity. In part this arose from external causes. The increased contact with the Greeks, especially the frequent journeys of the Romans into the Hellenic provinces and the assemblage of Greek literati in Rome, naturally procured a public even among the Italians for the Greek literature of the day, for the epic and elegiac poetry, epigrams, and Milesian tales current at that time in Greece. Moreover, as we have already stated (p. 533), the Alexandrian poetry had its established place in the instruction of the Italian youth; and thus reacted on Latin literature all the more, since the latter continued to be essentially dependent at all times on the Hellenistic school-training. We find in this respect even a direct connection of the new Roman with the new Greek literature; the already mentioned Parthenius, one of the better known Alexandrian elegists, opened, apparently about  $\frac{7000}{54}$ , a school for literature and poetry in Rome, and the excerpts are still extant in which he supplied one of his noble pupils with materials for Latin elegies of an erotic and mythological nature according to the well known Alexandrian receipt. But it was by no means simply such accidental occasions which called into existence the Roman Alexandrinism; it was on the contrary a product—perhaps not pleasing, but thoroughly inevitable—of the political and national development of Rome. On the one hand, as Hellas resolved itself into Hellenism, so now Latium resolved itself into Romanism; the national development of Italy became overgrown and was merged in Caesar's Mediterranean empire, just as the Hellenic development in the Eastern empire of Alexander. On the other hand, as the new empire rested on the fact that the mighty streams of Greek and Latin nationality, after having flowed in parallel channels for many centuries, now at length coalesced, the Italian literature had not merely as hitherto to seek its groundwork generally in the Greek, but also to put itself on a level with the Greek literature of the present, or in other words with Alexandrinism. With the scholastic Latin, with the closed number of classics, with the exclusive circle of classic-reading urbani, the national Latin literature was dead and at an end; there arose instead of it a thoroughly degenerate, artificially fostered, imperial literature, which did not rest on any definite nationality, but proclaimed in two languages the universal gospel of humanity, and was dependent in point of spirit throughout and consciously on the old Hellenic, in point of language partly on this, partly on the old Roman popular literature. This was no improvement. The Mediterranean monarchy of Caesar was doubtless a grand and—what is more—a necessary creation, but it had been called into life by an arbitrary superior will and therefore there was nothing to be found in it of the

iore natural

"""

""

inationality

the promise

of literature Every one who has a , . . . close affinity between art and nationality will always turn back from Cicero and Horace to Cato and Lucretius, and nothing but the school master's view of history and of literature-which has acquired. it is true, in this department the sanction of prescriptioncould have called the epoch of art beginning with the rew monarchy pre-eminently the golden age. But while the Romano Hellenic Alexandrinism of the age of Caesar and Augustus must be deemed infenor to the older, however im perfect, national literature, it is on the other hand as decid dis superior to the Alexandrinism of the age of the Diadochi as Caesar's enduring structure to the ephemeral creation of Alex ander We shall have afterwards to show that the Augustan literature, compared with the Lindred literature of the period of the Diadochi, was far less a literature of philologers and far more an imperial literature than the latter, and therefore had a far more permanent and far more general influence in the upper circles of society than the Greek Alexandrinism

Nowhere was the prospect more lamentable than in darnate interative. Tragedy and comedy had already before the present epoch become inwardly extinct in the Roman national herative. New pieces were no longer performed. That the public is ill in the Sollian age expected to sen such, appears from the reproductions—belonging to this epoch—of. Planting erreds with the tutles and names of the persons altered, with reference to which the integers well added that it was better to ser a good cld piece than a bad new one. From this it estip was resigned to that entire surrender of the stage to the did press which we find in the fuercomanage, and to which Alexandian amade no opposition. It is productiveness in this department was worse than none. Real dramatic composition is the alternative new knew, the spatial standard and in the future never knew, it is appreciation as if each of the same was written primarily for reading and not for eight arm, e.g., be introduced by it into Italy, and soon accordingly these dramatic lambles began to be quite as prevalent in Rome as in Alexandria, and the writing of tragedy in particular began to figure among the regular diseases of adolescence. We may form a pretty accurate idea of the quality of these productions from the fact that Quintus Cicero, in order homoeopathically to beguile the weariness of winter quarters in Gaul, composed four tragedies in sixteen days.

In the "picture of life" or mimus alone the last still vigorous product of the national literature, the Atellan farce, became engrafted with the ethological offshoots of Greek comedy, which Alexandrinism cultivated with greater poetical vigour and better success than any other branch of poetry. The mimus originated out of the dances in character to the flute, which had long been usual, and which were performed sometimes on other occasions, e.c. for the entertainment of the guests during dimer, but more especially in the pit of the theatre during the intervals between the acts. It was not difficult to form out of these dances-in which the aid of speech had doubtless long since been occasionally employed—by means of the introduction of a more organised plot and a regular dialogue little comedies, which were yet essentially distinguished from the earlier comedy and even from the farce by the facts, that the dance and the lasciviousness inseparable from such dancing continued in this case to play a chief part, and that the mimus, as belonging properly not to the boards but to the pit, threw aside all ideal scenic effects, such as masks for the face and theatrical huskins, and-what was specially important—admitted of the female characters being represented by women. This new mimus, which first seems to have come on the stage of the capital about  $f_{s,p}^{-2}$  soon swallowed up the national harlequinade, with which it indeed in the most essential respects coincided, and was employed as the usual interlude and especially as afterpiece along with the other dramatic per-formances.<sup>1</sup> The plot was of course still more indifferent, loose, &lt;sup>2</sup> Cicero testifies that the mimus in his time had taken the place of the Atellana (Ad Fam. ix. 16); with this accords the fact, that the mimi and mimae first appear about the Sullan epoch (Ad Her. i. 14, 24; ii. 13, 19; Atta, Fr. 1 Ribbeck; Plin. H. N. vii. 48, 158; Plutarch, Sull. 2, 36). The designation mimus, however, is sometimes inaccurately applied to the comedian generally. Thus the mimus who appeared at the festival of Apollo in  $\frac{E_1 + 2}{2} = \frac{E_1 + 1}{2}$  (Festus under salva resest; comp. Cicero, De Orat, ii. 59, 242) was evidently nothing but an actor of the palliata, for there was at this period no room in the development of the Roman theatre for real mimes in the later sense.

With the mimus of the classical Greek period—prose dialogues, in which

and absurd than in the harlequinade, if it was only sufficiently chequered, so that the beggar suddenly became a Croesus and so forth, they did not remonstrate with the poet who instead of untying the knot cut it to pieces. The subjects were chiefly of an amorous nature, mostly of the heentious sort, for example, poet and public without exception took part against the husband, and poetical justice consisted in the derision of good morals. The artistic charm depended wholl, as in the Atellana, on the portraiture of the manners of common and low life, in which rural pictures are laid aside for those of the life and doings of the capital, and the sweet rabble of Rome-just as in the similar Greck pieces the rabble of Alexandria—is summoned to appland its own likeness Many subjects are taken from the life of its own likeness. Many subjects are taken from the life of tradesmen, there appear the—here also inevitable—"Fuller," then the "Ropemaker," the "Dier," the "Silman," the "Female Weavers," the "Rascal," other pieces give sketches of character, as the "Fergeful," the "Braggart," the 'Man of 100,000 sesterces," or pictures of other lands, the "Etruscan Woman," the "Gauls," the "Cretan," "Alexandria," or descriptions of popular festivals, as the "Computala," the "Saturnalia," "Anna Perenna," the "Hot Baths," or parodies of mithology, as the "Voyage to the Underworld," the 'Arter principles and about communicate which man Lake Apt nicknames and short commonplaces which were easily retained and applied were welcome, but every piece of nonsense was of itself privileged, in this preposterous world Bacchus is applied to for water and the fountain by mph for wir-Isolated examples even of the political allusions formerly so strictly prohibited in the Roman theatre are found in these mures. As regards metrical form, these poets gave il enselves as they tell us, "but moderate trouble with the versification, the language abounded, even in the pieces prepared for publica-tion, with vulgar expressions and low figures. The more was, genre pictures particularly of a rural kand, were presented—the factors mimus had to especial relation

I With the persent seaton of this sum which constituted the quantity of the first voling-class and at specied the intentiance to the hierarch of the highest which represent the highest of the property of the property of the property of the property of the highest of the highest of the property of the

it is plain, in substance nothing but the former farce; with this exception, that the character-masks and the standing scenery of Atella as well as the rustic impress are dropped, and in their room the life of the capital in its boundless liberty and licence is brought on the stage. Most pieces of this sort were doubtless of a very fugitive nature and made no pretension to a place in literature; but the mimes of Laberius, full of pungent delineation of character and in point of language and metre exhibiting the hand of a master, maintained their ground in it; and even the historian must regret that we are no longer permitted to compare the drama of the republican death-struggle in Rome with its great attic counterpart.

With the worthlessness of dramatic literature the increase of scenic spectacles and of scenic pomp went hand in hand. Dramatic representations obtained their regular place in the public life not only of the capital but also of the country towns; the former also now at length acquired by means of Pompeius a permanent theatre  $\binom{699}{75}$ ; see p. 282), and the Campanian custom of stretching canvas over the theatre for the protection of the actors and spectators during the performance, which in ancient times always took place in the open air, now likewise found admission to Rome  $\binom{676}{78}$ . As at that time in Greece it was not the—more than pale—Pleiad of the Alexandrian dramatists, but the classic drama, above all the tragedies of Euripides, which amidst the amplest development of scenic resources kept the stage, so in Rome at the time of Cicero the tragedies of Ennius, Pacuvius, and Accius, and the comedies of Plautus were those chiefly produced. While the latter had been in the previous period supplanted by the more tasteful but in point of comic vigour far inferior Terence, Roscius and Varro, or in other words dramatic art and antiquarian scholarship, cooperated to procure for him a resurrection similar to that which Shakespeare experienced at the hands of Garrick and Johnson; but even Plautus had to suffer from the degenerate susceptibility and the impatient haste of an audience spoilt by the short and slovenly farces, so that the managers found themselves compelled to excuse the length of the Plautine comedies and even perhaps to make omissions and alterations. The more limited the stock of plays, the more the activity of the managing and executive staff as well as the interest of the public was directed to the scenic representation of the pieces. There was hardly any more lucrative trade in Rome than that of the actor and the dancing-girl of the first rank. The princely estate of the tragic celebrates. The confession of faith of the sirger of Rudiae (ii 425)—

Eço deum genus esse semper dess e' decam caelitum Sed eos non curare opinor, quid agal Fumanum genus-

describes completely the religious standpoint of Licretius, and not unjustly for that reason he himself terms his poem as it were the continuation of Ennius —

Ennius ul noster cecinit, qui frimus amorno De'ulit ex He icone perenni fronte coronam Per gentis Italas hominum quae cara cluret

Once more—and for the last time—the poem of Lucretius is resonant with the whole poetic pade and the whole poetic meannestness of the sixth century, in which, amidst the images of the formidable Carthaguian and the glorious Sciprid, the imagination of the poet is more at home than in his own demente age! To him too his own song "gracefulle well "gout of the abundance of feeling" sounds, as compared with the cry of the crane, "—with him too the heart swells, listenge to the melodies of its own invention, with the hop of illustrous honours—just as Ennius forbids the men to whom he "gave from the depth of the heart a foretaste of fery song," to mourn at his, the immortal singer's, tomb

It is a remarkable fatality, that this man of extraordinary talents, far superior in originality of poetic endowments to most in not to all his contemporates, fell upon an age in which he felt himself strange and forlom, and in consequence of this male the most singular mistake in the selection of a subject. The system of Epicurus, which converts the universe into a great vortex of atoms and undertakes to explain the origin and end of the world as well as all the problems of nature and of life in a pirely mechanical way, was doubtless somewhat less silly that the conversion of myths into history which was attempted by Euhemenis and after him by Ennius, but it was not an ingration or a fresh system, and the task of poetically unfolling this mechanical view of the world was of such a nature that rever probably did poet expend life and act on a more ungrateful term.

<sup>1</sup>This naively appears in the description of war in which the type-cells that destroy armies and the hests of elephanis that tranps 6 was those who are on their own side—pictures that is from the fund of ward-years as if they belong to the immediate present. Comp in 41, v 1811, 1916, 1919.

the omission of the finer points of the system, the superficiality especially with which controversies are presented, the defective division, the frequent repetitions, with quite as good reason as the poetical reader frets at the mathematics put into rhythm which makes a great portion of the poem absolutely unreadable. In spite of these incredible defects, before which every man of mediocre talent must inevitably have succumbed, this poet might justly boast of having carried off from the poetic wilderness a new chaplet such as the Muses had not yet bestowed on any; and it was by no means merely the occasional similitudes, and the other inserted descriptions of mighty natural phenomena and yet mightier passions, which acquired for the poet this chaplet. The genius which marks the view of life as well as the poetry of Lucretius depends on his unbelief, which came forward and was entitled to come forward with the full victorious power of truth, and therefore with the full vigour of poetry, in opposition to the prevailing hypocrisy or superstition.

Humana ante oculos foede cum vita jaceret
In terris oppressa gravi sub religione,
Quae caput a caeli regionibus ostendebat
Horribili super aspectu mortalibus instans, Primum Graius homo mortalis tendere contra Est oculos ausus primusque obsistere contra.
Ergo vivida vis animi pervicit, et extra Processit longe flammantia moenia mundi
Atque omne immensum peragravit mente animoque.

The poet accordingly was zealous to overthrow the gods, as Brutus had overthrown the kings, and "to release nature from her stern lords." But it was not against the long ago collapsed throne of Jovis that these flaming words were hurled; just like Ennius, Lucretius fights practically above all things against the wild foreign faiths and superstitions of the multitude, the worship of the Great Mother for instance and the childish lightning-lore of the Etruscans. Horror and antipathy towards that terrible world in general, in which and for which the poet wrote, suggested his poem. It was composed in that hopeless time when the rule of the oligarchy had been overthrown and that of Caesar had not yet been established, in the sultry years during which the outbreak of the civil war was awaited with long and painful suspense. If we seem to perceive in its unequal and restless utterance that the poet daily expected to see the wild tumult of revolution break forth over himself and his work, we must not with reference to his view of men and things forget amidst what men, and in prospect of what things, that view had its origin. In

Hellas at the epoch of Alexander the Great it was a current saying, and one profoundly felt by all the best men, that the best thing of all was not to be born, and the next best to def of all views of the world possible to a tender and poetically organised mind in the kindred Caesanan age this was the noblest the sleep of the night is more refreshing titals to a tions a p day, so death, eternal repose from all hope and fear, is better than life, as indeed the gods of the poet themselves are nothing, and have nothing, but an eternal blessed rest, that the pains of hell torment man, not after life, but during its course, in the wild and unruly passions of his throbbing heart, that the task of man is to attune his soul to equanimity, to esteem the purple no higher than the warm dress worn at home, rather to remain in the ranks of those that obey than to press into the confused crowd of candidates for the office of ruler, rather to le on the grass beside the brook than to take part under the golden criting of the rich in emptying his countless dishes. This philosophico-practical tendency is the true ideal essence of the I ucretian poem and is only overlaid, not choked by all the dreamness of its physical demonstrations Essentially on this rests its com parative wisdom and truth The man who with a reverence for his great predecessors and a vehement zeal, to which this century elsewhere knew no parallel, preached such doctrine and em bellished it with the charm of art, may be terried at once a good citizen and a great poet. The d dactie poem concerning the Nature of Things, however much it may challenge cersure I as remained one of the brilliant stars in the poorly illuminated expanse of Roman literature, and with reason the greatest el German philologists chose the task of making the Lucretian poem once more readable as his last and most masterly work

Lucreturs, although his poetical vigour as well as his sit was admired by his cultivated contemporanes, yet remarkd—of late growth as he was—a master without scholar in the Helleme fashionable poetry on the other hand it ere was no late at least of scholars, who exerted themselves to complete the Alexandrian masters. With true tact the more gifel of the Alexandrian poets avoided larger works and the pure form of poetry—the drams, the epics, the jury, the most pleas of gard successful performances consisted with them 1 st at with the new Latin poets, in "short-winded" tasks, and especially in such as belonged to the domains bordering on the pure forms of art, more especially to the wide field intervening between narrative and song. Multifarious didactic poems were written. Small half heroic, half erotic epics were great favourites, and especially an erudite sort of love-elegy peculiar to this autumnal summer of Greek poetry and characteristic of the philological source whence it sprang, in which the poet more or less arbitrarily interwove the description of his own feelings, chiefly amatory, with epic shreds from the cycle of Greek legend. Festal lays were diligently and ingeniously manufactured; in general, owing to the want of spontaneous poetical feeling, the occasional poem preponderated and especially the epigram, of which the Alexandrians produced excellent specimens. The poverty of materials and the want of freshness in language and rhythm, which inevitably cleave to every literature not national, men sought as much as possible to conceal under odd themes, farfetched phrases, rare words and artificial versification, and generally under the whole apparatus of philological and antiquarian erudition and technical dexterity.

Such was the gospel which was preached to the Roman boys of this period, and they came in crowds to hear and to practise it; already (about 700 the love poems of Euphorion and similar Alexandrian poetry formed the ordinary reading and the ordinary pieces for declamation of the cultivated youth. The literary revolution took place; but it yielded in the first instance with rare exceptions only premature or unripe fruits. The number of the "new-fashioned poets" was legion, but poetry was rare and Apollo was compelled, as always when so many throng towards Parnassus, to make very short work. The long poems never were worth anything, the short ones seldom. Even in this literary age the poetry of the day had become a public nuisance; it sometimes happened that one's friend would send home to him by way of mockery as a festal present a pile of trashy verses fresh from the bookseller's shop, whose value was at once betrayed by the elegant binding and the smooth paper. A real public, in the sense in which national literature has a public, was wanting to the Roman Alexandrians as well as to the Hellenic; it was thoroughly the poetry of a clique or rather productions in fresh verses, and variously sought to secure ior the - -- and ophemeral renown. A poetically active īn ) have exercised a sort of scholastic patronage over the most distinguished men of this circle, and to have pronounced final decision on the relative value of the poems. As compared with their Greek models, these Roman poets evince throughout a want of freedom, sometimes a schoolboy dependence; most of their products must have been simply the austere fruits of a school poetry still occupied in learning and by no means yet dismissed as mature. Inasmuch as in language and in measure they adhered to the Greek patterns far more closely than ever the national Latin poetry had done, a greater correctness and consistency in language and metre were certainly attained; but it was at the expense of the flexibility and fullness of the national idiom. As respects the subject-matter, under the influence partly of effeminate models, partly of an immoral age, amatory themes acquired a surprising preponderance little conducive to poetry; but the favourite metrical compendia of the Greeks were also in various cases translated, such as the astronomical treatise of Aratus hu Cirera and, either at the end of this or more probably host of poets but few names have ocen putactical it. '.' '.' even these are mostly mentioned merely as curiosities or as one upon a time great; such as the orator Quintus Hortensias with his "five hundred thousand lines" of tiresome obscruity, and the somewhat more frequently mentioned Laevius, whose trooppagnia authorated a certain interest only by that nonplicated measures and affected phraselogy. Even the small epic of Smyrna by Gaius Helvius Cinna (+¼°), much as it was praised by the clique, bears both in its subject—the incestious love of a daughter for her father—and in the nine years' toil bestowed on it the worst characteristics of the time.

<sup>1&</sup>quot; No doubt," says Cicero (Tusc. iii. 19, 45) in reference to Ennius, "the glorious poet is despised by our reciters of Euphorion." "I have safely arrived," he writes to Atticus (vii. 2 init.), "as a most favourable north wind blew for us across from Epirus. This spondaic line you may, if you choose, sell to one of the new-fashioned poets as your own" (ita belle nobis flavit ab Epiro lenissumus Onchesmites. Hunc σπονδειάζοντα si cui voles τῶν νεωτέρων pro tuo vendito).

Those poets alone of this school constitute an original and pleasing exception, who knew how to combine with its neatness and its versatility of form the national elements of worth still existing in the republican life, especially in that of the countrytowns. To say nothing here of Laberius and Varro, this description applies especially to the three poets already mentioned above (p. 300) of the republican opposition, Marcus Furius Bibaculus  $(\frac{6.5}{1.0}, \frac{2}{0.0}, \frac{6.5}{0.0})$ , Gaius Licinius Calvus  $(\frac{6.5}{1.0}, \frac{2}{0.0}, \frac{2}{0.0})$ , and Quintus Valerius Catullus  $(\frac{6.6}{8.7}, \frac{2}{0.0}, \frac{7.0}{0.4})$ . Of the two former, whose writings have perished, we can indeed only conjecture this; respecting the poems of Catullus we can still form a judgment. He too depends in subject and form on the Alexandrians. We find in his collection translations of pieces of Callimachus, and these not altogether the very good, but the very difficult. Among the original pieces, we meet with elaborately-turned fashionable poems, such as the over-artificial Galliambics in praise of the Phrygian Mother; and even the poem, otherwise so beautiful, of the marriage of Thetis has been artistically spoiled by the truly Alexandrian insertion of the complaint of Ariadne in the principal poem. But by the side of these schoolpieces we meet with the melodious lament of the genuine elegy, the festal poem in the full pomp of individual and almost dramatic execution, above all, the freshest miniature-painting of cultivated social life, the pleasant and very unreserved amatory adventures of which half the charm consists in prattling and poetising about the mysteries of love, the delightful life of youth with full cups and empty purses, the pleasures of travel and of poetry, the Roman and still more frequently the Veronese anecdote of the town, and the humorous jest amidst the familiar circle of friends. But not only does Apollo touch the lyre of the poet, he wields also the bow; the winged dart of sarcasm spares neither the tedious verse-maker nor the provincial who corrupts the language, but it hits none more frequently and more sharply than the potentates by whom the liberty of the people is endangered. The short-lined and merry metres, often enlivened by a graceful refrain, are of finished art and yet free from the repulsive smoothness of the manufactory. These poems lead us alternately to the valleys of the Nile and the Po; but the poet is incomparably more at home in the latter. His poems are based on Alexandrian art doubtless, but at the same time on the distinctive feelings of a burgess and a burgess in fact of a rural town, on the contrast of Verona with Rome, on the contrast of the homely municipal with the high-born lords of the senate who usually maltreat their humble friends—as that contrast was probably felt more vividly than anywhere else in Catullus' home, the flourishing and comparatively vigorous Cisalpine Gaul. The most heautiful of his poems reflect the sweet pictures of the Lago di Garda, and hardly could any man of the capital have written a poem like the deeply pathetic one on his brother's death, or the excellent genuinely homely festal hymn for the marriage of Manlius and Aurunculeia. Catullus, although dependent on the Alexandrian masters and in the midst of the fashionable and clique poetry of that age, was yet not merely a good scholar among many mediocre and had ones, but himself as much superior to his electrified by these fugitive songs, but the art-critics of the Augustan age also characterising him along with Lucretius as the most important poet of this epoch, his contemporaries as well as their successors were completely right. The Latin nation has produced no second poet in whom the artistic substance and the artistic form appear in so symmetrical perfection as in Catullus; and in this sense the collection of the poems of Catullus is certainly the most perfect which Latin poetry as a whole can show.

Lastly, poetry in a prose form begins in this epoch. The law of genuine naive as well as conscious art, which had litherto remained unchangeable—that the poetical subject-matter and the metrical setting should go together—gave way before the intermixture and disturbance of all kinds and forms of art, which is one of the most similar of the last specific to the control of the most similar of the control of th tales of Aristides-licentious fashionable novels of the most

A more original and pleasing phenomenon in the debatable border-land between poetry and prose was the nesthetic writings of Varro, who was not merely the most important representative of Latin philologico-historical research, but one of the most fertile and most interesting authors in bellev-letter. Descended from a plebelan gers which had its home in the Sabine land, but had belonged for the last two hundred years to the Roman senate, strictly reared in antique discipline and decorum, and already at the beginning of this epoch a man of maturity, Marcus Terentius Varro of Reate ( $^{6.3}_{116} = ^{7.2}_{27}$ ) belonged in politics, as a matter of course, to the constitutional party, and bore an honourable and energetic part in its doings and sufferings. He supported it, partly in literature—as when he combated the first coalition, the "three-headed monster," in pamphlets; partly in more serious warfare, where we found him in the army of Pompeius as commandant of Further Spain (p. 359). When the cause of the republic was lost, Varro was destined by his conqueror to be librarian of the library which was to be formed in the capital. The troubles of the following period drew the old man once more into their vortex, and it was not till seventeen years after Caesar's death, in the eighty-ninth year of his well-occupied life, that death called him away.

The aesthetic writings, which have made him a name, were brief essays, some in simple prose and of graver contents, others humorous sketches the prose groundwork of which was inlaid with various poetical effusions. The former were the "philosophico-historical dissertations" (Logistorici), the latter the Menippean Satires. In neither case did he follow Latin models, and the Satura of Varro in particular was by no means based on that of Lucilius. In fact the Roman Satura in general was not properly a fixed species of art, but only indicated negatively the fact that the "multifarious poem" was not to be included under any of the recognised forms of art; and accordingly the Satura-poetry assumed in the hands of every gifted poet a different and peculiar character. It was rather in the pre-Alexandrian Greek poetry that Varro found the models for his more severe as well as for his lighter aesthetic works; for the graver dissertations, in the dialogues of Heraclides of Heraclea on the Black Sea (+about  $\frac{45}{200}$ ), for the satires, in the writings of Menippus of Gadara in Syria (flourishing about  $\frac{47}{200}$ ). The choice was significant. Heraclides, stimulated as an author by Plato's philosophical dialogues, had amidst the brilliance of their form totally lost sight of the scientific contents and made the poetico-fabulistic dress the main matter; he was an agreeable and largely-read author, but far from a philosopher. Menippus was quite as <sup>1&</sup>quot; For me when a boy," he somewhere says, "there sufficed a single rough coat and a single under-garment, shoes without stockings, a horse without a saddle; I had no daily warm bath, and but seldom a river-bath." On account of his personal valour he obtained in the Piratic war, where he commanded a division of the fleet, the naval crown.

...

little a philosopher, but the most genume literary representative of that philosophy whose wisdom consisted in densing philosophy and ridiculing philosophers, the critical wisdom of Diogenes, a comic teacher of serious wisdom, he proved by examples and merry sayings that except an upright life everythe true models for stupid, and penals -"1 canhiml Romans 1 B

form he derived from Heraundes a nature too individual and too

his imitative creations essentially independent and national

For his grave dissertations, in which a moral maxim or other -- the disdained in his frame tales, as Herachdes had even childish little stones , reawakened to life after he borrowed the dress being seven days dead Dut sto from the nobler my the of the Greeks, as in the essas "Orestes " lace " history ordinarily afforded him a

. were called, laudationes of tsite to a phaci of the constitutional party. Thus the dissertation ' con cerning Peace" was at the same time a memorial of Metellus Prus, the last in the brilliant series of successful generals of the senate, that 'concerning the Worship of the Gods' was at the same time destined to preserve the memory of the highly respected Optimate and Pontifex Gaius Curio, the essay 'en Tate" was connected with Marius, that "on the Wri'rg of History" with Sisenna the first historian of this epoch, that summarily declares all systems that an as their tilt mate a m to be are we of philosophies ecocritatio print

this supposition as two hum. I is deletts enti. The attendant unfortunately too much a scholar to evalue that he relieve eval a r would be a philosopher and accordingly as such throughout Lie be performed a blind dance-not altigether becoming tessees the 5 a Pythagoreanism and Diogenism.

"on the Beginnings of the Roman Stage" with the princely giver of scenic spectacles Scaurus, that "on Numbers" with the highly-polished Roman banker Atticus. The two philosophico-historical essays "Laelius or concerning Friendship," "Cato or concerning Old Age," which Cicero wrote probably after the model of those of Varro, may give us some approximate idea of Varro's half didactic, half narrative, treatment of these subjects. The Menippean satire was handled by Varro with equal originality of form and contents; the bold mixture of prose and verse is foreign to the Greek original, and the whole intellectual contents are pervaded by Roman idiosyncrasy—one might say, by a savour of the Sabine soil. These satires like the essays already noticed handle some moral or other theme adapted to the larger public, as is shown by the several titles— Columnae Herculis,  $\pi \epsilon \rho i \Delta \delta \xi \eta s$ ;  $E \delta \rho \epsilon \nu \dot{\eta} \Lambda \delta \pi \dot{\alpha} s \tau \delta \Pi \delta \mu \alpha$ ,  $\pi \epsilon \rho i$ Γεγαμηκότων; Est Modus Matulae, περί Μέθης; "Papiapapae, περί Έγκωμίων." The plastic dress, which in this case might not be wanting, is of course but seldom borrowed from the history of his native country, as in the satire Serranus, περί Αρχαιρεσιών. The dog-world of Diogenes on the other hand plays, as might be expected, a great part; we meet with the Κυνίστωρ, the Κυνορρήτωρ, the Ἰπποκύων, the Ὑδροκύων, the Κυνοδιδασκαλικόν, and others of a like kind. Mythology is also laid under contribution for comic purposes; we find a Prometheus Liber, an Ajax Stramenticius, a Hercules Socraticus, a Sesqueulixes who had spent not merely ten but fifteen years in wanderings. The outline of the dramatic or romantic framework is still discoverable from the fragments in some pieces, such as the Prometheus Liber, the Sexagessis, the Manius; it appears that Varro frequently, perhaps regularly, narrated the tale as his own experience; e.g. in the Manius the dramatis personae go to Varro and discourse to him "because he was known to them as a bookmaker." As to the poetical value of this dress we are no longer allowed to form any certain judgment; there still occur in our fragments several very charming sketches full of wit and liveliness—thus in the "Prometheus Liber" the hero after the loosing of his chains opens a manufactory of men, in which Goldshoe the rich (Chrysosandalos) bespeaks for himself a maiden, of milk and finest wax, such as the Milesian bees gather from various flowers, a maiden without bones and sinews, without skin or hair, pure and polished, slim, smooth, tender, charming. The life-breath of this poetry is polemics—not so much the political warfare of party, such as Lucilius and Catullus practised, but the general moral antagonism of the stern elderly man to the unbridled and perverse youth, of the scholar living in the midst of his classics to the loose and slovenly, or at any rate in point of tendency reproduct, modern poetry, of the good burgess of the ancient type to the new Rome in which the Forum, to use Varro's language, was a pigsty and Numa, if he turned this eyes to mards his city, would see no longer a trace of his wise regulations. In the constitutional struggle Varro did what seemed to him the duty of a citizen; but his heart was not in such partisan agitation—"why," he complains on one occasion, "do ye call me from my pare life into the fifth of your senate-house?" He belonged to the good old time, when the talk savoured of onions and garlie, but the new times; but it tesuited the philosophy and from the temperament of Varro, that the standard of the temperament and the test of the temperament lash was very specially piled round the ears of the temperament lash was very specially piled round the test of the services of the time transmitted to the series of the truly issued treatises. Philosophising is verily no art. With the tenth part of the trouble with which a master rears his star to be a professional baker, he trains himself to be a philosopher, no doubt, when the baker and the philosopher both come under the hammer, the artist of pastry goes off a hundred times dearn than the philosopher. Singular people, there philosophers One enjoins that corpuse be buried in honey—it is a forunate circumstance that his desire is not complied with, otherwise where would any honey-wine be felt? Another thinks that

1 On one occasion he writes, "Quadiforis Chila forts as poemats resignificant discs. O fortuna, O fors fortuna." And elumber. Exempliant discs. O fortuna, O fors fortuna. And elumber. Exempliant fortunal fortun

The following description of himself by a poet in Vacro a Orm Alpsi,

Pacure discipulus dicor, poero is feel Enni, Ennius Musarum, Pompe'ius ciurce might aptly paroly the introduction of Enerality in 5311, to whem Very as a declared enemy of the Epicurean system cannot have been well deposed, and whom he never quotes.

men grow out of the earth like cresses. A third has invented a world-borer (Κοσμοτορύνη) by which the earth will some day be destroyed.

Postremo, nemo aegrolus quicquam somnial Tam infandum, quod non aliquis dicat philosophus.

It is ludicrous to observe how a Long-beard—by which is meant an etymologising Stoic—cautiously weighs every word in goldsmith's scales; but there is nothing that surpasses the genuine philosophers' quarrel—a Stoic boxing-match far excels any encounter of athletes. In the satire Marcopolis,  $\pi\epsilon\rho i$   $a\rho\chi\eta s$ , when Marcus created for himself a Cloud-Cuckoo-Home after his own heart, matters fared, just as in the Attic comedy, well with the peasant, but ill with the philosopher; the  $Celer-\delta i$ - $\delta i$

With this morally polemic tendency and this talent for embodying it in caustic and picturesque expression, which, as the dress of dialogue given to the books on Husbandry written in his eightieth year shows, never forsook him down to extreme old age, Varro most happily combined an incomparable knowledge of the national manners and language, which is embodied in the philological writings of his old age after the manner of a commonplace-book, but displays itself in his Satires in all its direct fulness and freshness. Varro was in the best and fullest sense of the term a local antiquarian, who from the personal observation of many years knew his nation in its former idiosyncrasy and seclusion as well as in its modern state of transition and dispersion, and had supplemented and deepened his direct knowledge of the national manners and national language by the most comprehensive investigation of historical and literary archives. His partial deficiency in rational judgment and learning-in our sense of the words-was compensated for by his clear intuition and the poetry which lived within him. He sought neither after antiquarian notices nor after rare antiquated or poetical words; 1 but he was himself an old and old-fashioned man and almost a rustic, the classics of his nation were his favourite and long-familiar companions; how could it fail that many details of the manners of his forefathers which he loved above all and especially knew should be narrated in his writings, and that his discourse should abound with proverbial Greek and Latin phrases, with good old words preserved in the Sabine conversational language, with reminiscences of Ennius, Lucil.is, and above all of Plautus We should not judge as to the prose style of these aesthetic writings of Varro's earlier period by the standard of his work on Language written in his old age and probably published in an unfinished state, in which certainly the clauses of the sentence are arranged on the thread of the relative like thrushes on a string, but we have already observed that Varro rejected on principle the effort after a chaste style and Attic periods (p 537), and his aesthetic essays, while destitute of the mean bombast and the spurious tinsel of vulgarism, were yet written after an unclassic and even slovenly fashion, in sentences rather directly joined on to each other than regularly subdivided The poetical pieces inserted on the other hand show not merely that their author knew how to mould the most varied measures with as much master, as any of the fashionable poets, but that he had a right to include himself among those to whom a god has granted the gift of "banishing cares from the heart by song and sacred poes, "1

&lt;sup>1</sup> He himself once aptly says, that he had no special fondness for antiquated words, but frequently used them, and that he was very fond of poetical words, but did not use them.

The following description is taken from the Marrifer ( Stave of Marcus )

Repente nochs eireiter menåren Cum pictus aer fercidis late renibus Caels chorean astricen ostenderet. Nubes aquals frigido velo les es Caels caternas aureas subduserant Am am comentes inferam mortalibus · muterant

In the Ardpurdroles we find the lines

Non fl thesauris non auro fectu solutum hon demunt animis curas ac religiones Persarum montes, non a era dieus Crassi

But the poet was successful also in a lighter vein. In the Fit Mides Matulae there stood the following elegant commendation of whe

I eno nekel encundrus quesquam betel Hot acgriludinem as mesensam interieruni Hee kantila is dule amoinarium

Hee consent coagulum consens

And in the Losuros sy the wanderer returning home thus er total eddress to the sallers -

Desa katemas animas lent Dum nos rentus famine sudo Sustem ad ba riam perducil

The sketches of Varro no more created a school than the didactic poem of Lucretius; to the more general causes which prevented this there falls to be added their thoroughly individual stamp, which was inseparable from the greater age, from the rusticity, and even from the peculiar learning of their author. But the grace and humour of the Menippean satires above all, which seem to have been in number and importance far superior to Varro's graver works, captivated his contemporaries as well as those in after times who had any relish for originality and national spirit; and even we, who are no longer permitted to read them, may still from the fragments preserved discern in some measure that the writer "knew how to laugh and how to jest in moderation." And as the last breath of the good spirit of the old burgess-times ere it departed, as the latest fresh growth which the national Latin poetry put forth, the Satires of Varro deserved that the poet in his poetical testament should commend these his Menippean children to every one "who had at heart the prosperity of Rome and of Latium;" and they accordingly retain an honourable place in the literature as in the history of the Italian people.1

<sup>1</sup> The sketches of Varro have so uncommon historical and even poetical significance, and are yet, in consequence of the fragmentary shape in which information regarding them has reached us, known to so few and so irk-some to study, that we may be allowed to give in this place a resume of some of them with the few restorations indispensable for making them

The satire Manius (Early Up!) describes the management of a rural household. "Manius summons his people to rise with the sun, and in person conducts them to the seene of their labours. The youths make their own bed, which labour renders soft to them, and supply themselves with waterpot and lamp. Their drink is the clear fresh spring, their fare bread, and onions as a relish. Everything prospers in house and field. The house is no work of art; but an architect might learn symmetry from it. Care is taken of the field, that it shall not be left disorderly and waste, or go to ruin through slovenliness and neglect; in return the grateful Ceres wards off damage from the produce, that the high-piled sheaves may gladden the heart of the husbandman. Here hospitality still holds good; every one who has but imbibed mother's milk is welcome. The bread-pantry and wine-vat and the store of sausages on the rafters, lock and key are at the service of the traveller, and piles of food are set before him; contented sits the sated guest, looking neither before nor behind, dozing by the hearth in the kitchen. The warmest double-wool sheep-skin is spread as a couch for him. Here people still as good burgesses obey the righteous law, which neither out of envy injures the innocent, nor out of favour pardons the guilty. Here they speak no evil against their neighbours. Here they trespass not with their feet on the sacred hearth, but honour the gods with devotion and with sacrifices, throw to the familiar spirit his little bit of flesh into his appointed little dish, and when the master of the household dies, accompany the bier with the same prayer with which those of his father and of his grandfather were borne forth.".

In another satire there appears a "Teacher of the Old" (Γεροντοδιδά:

The critical writing of history, after the manner in which the Attic authors wrote the national history in their classic period and in which Polybius wrote the history of the world, was never properly developed in Rome. Even in the field most adapted for it—the representation of contemporary and of recently past events—there was nothing, on the whole, but more or less inadequate attempts; in the epoch especially from Sulla to Caesar the not very important contributions, which the previous epoch had to show in this field—the labours of Antipater and Asellius—were barely even equalled. The only work of note belonging to this field, which arose in the present epoch, was the history of the Social and Civil Wars by Lucius Comelius Sisc degenerating into puerility; as indeed the few remaining large-

Sisc

Jan 1982

The second of th

Roman husbandman had his beard shaven once every week, the his rural slave cannot have it fine enough. Formerly one taw on the estate trural slave cannot have it fine enough. Formerly one taw on the estate rural slave cannot have it for the wire value.

Ter sub arms malim vilam cernere
Ouam servel modo terere -

Formerly the wife was quite content, when the inchand error or twice is the year gave her a trip in the unconfidenced as retaining, he because the year of the country extains without for, and the frarefling is for humbard great to bit country extain without for, and the frarefling lady is streamed in the wife by the fashionable host of Greek menials and the chiral-in a treatment of graver kind, "Cattes or the Training of Children," A arror activation of the first of the first of the product of th

ments exhibit a paltry painting in detail of the horrible, and a number of words newly coined or derived from the language of conversation. When it is added that the author's model and, so to speak, the only Greek historian familiar to him was Clitarchus, the author of a biography of Alexander the Great oscillating between history and fiction in the manner of the semi-romance which bears the name of Curtius, we shall not hesitate to recognise in Sisenna's celebrated historical work, not a product of genuine historical criticism and art, but the first Roman essay in that hybrid mixture of history and romance so much a favourite with the Greeks, which desires to make the groundwork of facts life-like and interesting by means of fictitious details and thereby makes it insipid and untrue; and it will no longer excite surprise that we meet with the same Sisenna as translator of Greek fashionable romances (p. 558).

That the prospect should be still more lamentable in the field of the general annals of the city and even of the world, is implied in the nature of the case. The increasing activity of antiquarian research induced the expectation that the current narrative man thinks, are now fed more judiciously than the children—and likewise against the enchantresses' charms and blessings, which in cases of sickness so often take the place of consulting the physician. He advises to keep the girls at embroidery, that they may afterwards understand how to judge properly of embroidered and textile work, and not to allow them to put off the child's dress too early; he warns against carrying boys to the gladiatorial games, in which the heart is early pardoned and cruelty learned.—In the "Man of Sixty Years" Varro appears as a Roman Epimenides who had fallen asleep when a boy of ten and awoke again after half a century. He is astonished to find instead of his smooth-shorn boy's head an old bald pate with an ugly snout and savage bristles like a hedgehog; but he is still more astonished at the change in Rome. Lucrine oysters, formerly a wedding dish, are now every-day fare; for which, accordingly, the bankrupt glutton silently prepares the incendiary torch. While formerly the father disposed of his boy, now the disposal is transferred to the latter: he disposes, forsooth, of his father by poison. The comitium had become an exchange, the criminal trial a mine of gold for the jurymen. No law is any longer obeyed save only this one, that nothing is given for nothing. All virtues have vanished; in their stead the awakened man is saluted by the impiety, perfidy, lewdness of the new denizens. "Alas for thee, Marcus, with such a sleep and such an awakening!"—The sketch resembles the Catilinarian epoch, shortly after which (about $\frac{6.9.7}{6.7.0}$) the old man must have written it, and there lay a truth in the bitter turn at the close; where Marcus, properly reproved for his unseasonable accusations and antiquarian reminiscences, is—with a mock application of a primitive Roman custom—dragged as an useless old man to the bridge and thrown into the Tiber. There was certainly no longer room for such men in Rome.

"The innocent," so ran a speech, "thou draggest forth, trembling in every limb, and on the high margin of the river's bank in the dawn of the morning" [thou causest them to be slaughtered]. Several such phrases, that might be inserted without difficulty in a commonplace novel, occur.

would be rectified from documents and other trus-worth sources, but this hope was not fulfilled The more and th deeper men investigated, the more clearly it became apparen what a task it was to write a critical history of Rome. Th difficulties even, which opposed themselves to investigatio and narration, were immense, but the most dangerous obstacle were not those of a literary kind. The conventional early history of Rome, as it had now been narrated and believed for at least ten generations (1 457), was most intimately mixed up with the civil life of the nation, and jet in any thorough and honest inquiry not only had details to be modified here we there, but the whole building had to be overturned as much as the Franconian primitive history of king Pharamurd or the British of king Arthur An inquirer of conservative views, such as was Varro for instance, could have no wish to put his hand to such a work, and if a daring freethinker had undertaken it, an outery would have been raised by all good citizens against this worst of all revolutionaries, who was preparing to deprive the constitutional party even of their past. Thus philological and antiquarian research deterred from the writing of history rather than conduced towards it. Varro and the more sagacious men in general evidently gave up the task of annals as hopeless, at the most they arranged, as dvi Trus Pomponius Atticus, the official and gentile lists in unpretending tabular shape—a work by which the synchronistic Gracer-Roman chronology was finally brought into the shape in which it was conventionally fixed for posterity. But the manufacture of city-chronicles of course did not suspend its activity, if continued to supply its contributions both in prose and verse 10 the great library written by enrus for ernas, while the trakers of the books, in part already freedmen, did not trouble them selves at all about research properly so called Such of these writings as are noticed-not one of them is preserved-seem to have been not only of a wholly secondary character, but m great part even pervaded by interested falsification. It i the that the chronicle of Quintus Claudius Quadriganas (ale. (37) was written in an old fashioned but good s'sl- and studied at least a commerdable brevity in the representate net the fahulous period Gains Licinius Macer (+as li'e pract ? in % ), father of the poet Calvus (p 557) and a zeal us demecra. laid claim more than any other chronyler to decementary research and enticism, but his him limiter and other marren pecular to him are in the lighest degree suspicious and an

interpolation of the whole annals for purposes of a democratic character—an interpolation of a very extensive kind, and which has passed over in part to the latter annalists—is probably traceable to him. Lastly, Valerius Antias excelled all his predecessors in prolixity as well as in puerile story-telling. The falsification of numbers was here systematically carried out down even to contemporary history, and the primitive history of Rome was elaborated once more from one form of insimility to another; for instance the narrative of the way in which the wise Numa according to the instructions of the nymph Egeria caught the gods Faunus and Picus with wine, and the beautiful conversation thereupon held by the same Numa with the god Jupiter, cannot be too urgently recommended to all worshippers of the so-called legendary history of Rome in order that, if possible, they may believe these things—of course, in substance. It would have been a marvel if the Greek novel-writers of this period had allowed such materials, made as if for their use, to In fact there were not wanting Greek literati, who worked up the Roman history into romances; such a composition, for instance, was the Five Books "Concerning Rome" of the Alexander Polyhistor already mentioned among the Greek literati living in Rome (p. 540), a preposterous mixture of vapid historical tradition and trivial, principally erotic, fiction. He, it may be conjectured, took the first steps towards filling up the five hundred years, which were wanting to bring the destruction of Troy and the origin of Rome into the chronological connection required by the fables on either side, with one of those lists of kings without achievements which were unhappily familiar to the Egyptian and Greek chroniclers; for, to all appearance, it was he that launched into the world the kings Aventinus and Tiberinus and the Alban gens of the Silvii, whom the following times accordingly did not neglect to furnish in detail with name, period of reigning, and, for the sake of greater definiteness, also a portrait.

Thus from various sides the historical romance of the Greeks finds its way into Roman historiography; and it is more than probable that not the least portion of what we are accustomed now-a-days to call tradition of the Roman primitive times proceeds from sources of the stamp of Amadis of Gaul and the chivalrous romances of Fouqué—an edifying consideration, which may be commended to those who have a relish for the humour of history and who know how to appreciate the comical aspect of the piety still cherished in certain circles of the nineteenth century for king Numa.

At Promotion of this period is the annear-

of men at any rate who exercised influence on the Roman or Greek history. These works are of a kindred nature with the universal histories which the Greeks had for a considerable time been composing; and these very Greek world-chronicles, such as that of Kastor son-in-law of the Galatan king Diciorans, concluded in $3.0 now began to include in their range the Roman bistory which previously they had neglected. These works

histor

ceptic....

rather the product of the practical exigencies of senson and sometimetron. These general chronicles, treaties for scholastic instruction or manuals for reference, and the whole literature therewith connected which subsequently became very copius in the Latin language also, can hardly be reckoned as belonguage of artistic historical composition; and Nepos himself in particular was a mere compiler distinguished neither by spirit not even by symmetrical plan.

The historiography of this period is certainly remarkable and in a high degree characteristic, but it is as far from pleasing at the age itself. The interpenetration of Greek and Latin litrature is in no field so clearly apparent as in that of history; here the respective literatures become carliest equalsted in matter and form, and the conception of Helicon-Italic history as at unity, in which Polybius was so far in advance of his age, was now learned by Greek and Roman boys at school. But will the Mediterranean state had found an historian before it had become conscious of its own existence, now, when that consciouses that some extense, now, when that consciouses had been attained, there did not arise either according forcels or among the Romans any man who was able to girt to it adequate expression. "There is no such thing," say a form, "as Roman historical companion;" and, so far as we can judge, this is no more than the sumple truth. The run of research turns away from writing history, the writer of history turns away from research; historical literature oscillates between the schoolbook and the romance. All the species of pure artepos, drama, lyric poetry, history—are worthless in this worthless world; but in no species is the intellectual decay of the Ciceronian age reflected with so terrible a clearness as in its historiography.

The minor historical literature of this period displays on the other hand, amidst many insignificant and forgotten productions, one treatise of the first rank—the Memoirs of Caesar, or rather the Military Report of the democratic general to the people from whom he had received his commission. The most finished section, and that which alone was published by the author himself, describing the Celtic campaigns down to  $\frac{702}{52}$ , is evidently designed to justify as well as possible before the public the formally unconstitutional enterprise of Caesar in conquering a great country and constantly increasing his army for that object without instructions from the competent authority; it was written and given forth in  $\frac{703}{61}$ , when the storm broke out against Caesar in Rome and he was summoned to dismiss his army and answer for his conduct.<sup>1</sup> The author of this vindication writes, as he himself says, entirely as an officer and carefully avoids extending his military report to the hazardous departments of political organisation and administration. His incidental and partisan treatise cast in the form of a military report is itself a piece of history like the bulletins of Napoleon,

¹ That the treatise on the Gallic war was published all at once, has been long conjectured; the distinct proof that it was so, is furnished by the mention of the equalisation of the Boii and the Haedui already in the first book (c. 28) whereas the Boii still appear in the seventh (c. 10) as tributary subjects of the Haedui, and evidently only obtained equal rights with their former masters on account of their conduct and that of the Haedui in the war against Vereingetorix. On the other hand any one who attentively follows the history of the time will find in the expression as to the Milonian crisis (vii. 6) a proof that the treatise was published before the outbreak of the civil war; not because Pompeius is there praised, but because Caesar there approves the exceptional laws of  $\frac{70.2}{5.5}$  (p. 304). This he might and could not but do, so long as he sought to bring about a peaceful accommodation with Pompeius (p. 332), but not after the rupture, when he reversed the condemnations that took place on the basis of those laws injurious for him (p. 432). Accordingly the publication of this treatise has been quite rightly placed in  $\frac{70.3}{5.1}$ .

rightly placed in  $\frac{70.3}{3.1}$ .

The tendency of the work, we discern most distinctly in the constant, often—most decidedly, doubtless, in the case of the Aquitanian expedition, iii. 11—not successful, justification of every single act of war as a defensive measure which the state of things had rendered inevitable. That the adversaries of Caesar censured his attacks on the Celts and Germans above all as unprovoked, is well known (Sueton. Caes. 24).

but it is not, and was not intended to be, an historical work in the true sense of the word, the objective form which the narrative assumes is that of the magistrate, not that of the historian But in this modest character the work is masterly and finished, more than any other in all Roman literature The narrative is always terse and never scanty, always sump'e and never careless, always of transparent vividness and never strained or affected The language is completely pure from archaisms and from vulgarisms—the type of the modern urbanitas In the Books concerning the Civil Har we seem to feel that the author had desired to avoid war and could not avoid it, and perhaps also that in Caesar's soul, as in every other, the period of hope was purer and fresher than that of fulfilment, but over the treatise on the Gallic war there is diffused a bright serenity, a simple charm, which are no less unique in literature than Caesar is in history

Of a kindred nature were the letters interchanged between the statesmen and literati of this period, which were carfully collected and published in the following spech, such as the correspondence of Caesar himself, of Cicero, Calvus, and other. They can still less be included among strictly literary perform ances, but this literature of correspondence was a rich storhouse for historical as for all other research, and the meet faithful mirror of an epoch in which so much of the worth of past times and so much spirit, eleveness, and talent were

evaporated and dissinated in trilling

A journalist literature in the modern sense was never former in Rome, literary warfare continued to be confined to the other hand subordinate persons were employed to note count the events of the dix and news of the cry for the above men of quality, and Carser as early as his first consubity took fitter measures for the immediate publication of an extract of the transactions of the senate. From the private journals of the Roman penny a liners and these official current reports there arose a sort of news sheet for the capital (a his diama) in what the extract of the histories discussed before the people at his two genate, and births, deaths, and such like were recorded. This became a not unimportant source for history, but remained without proper political as without hierard in infantific composition of orations. The speech whether written down or not, is in its nature ephemeral and does not belong to literature; but it may, like the report and the letter, and indeed still more readily than these, come to be included, through the significance of the moment and the power of the mind from which it springs, among the permanent treasures of the national literature. in Rome the records of orations of a political tenor delivered before the burgesses or the jurymen had for long played a great part in public life; and not only so, but the speeches of Gaius Gracchus in particular were justly reckoned among the classical Roman writings. But in this epoch a singular change occurred on all hands. The composition of political speeches was on the decline like political speaking itself. The political speech in Rome, as generally in the ancient polities, reached its culminating point in the discussions before the burgesses; there the orator was not fettered, as in the senate, by corporate considerations and burdensome forms, nor, as in the judicial addresses, by the interests-in themselves foreign to politics-of the accusation and defence; there alone his heart swelled proudly before the whole great and mighty Roman people hanging on his lips. But all this was now gone. Not as though there was any lack of orators or of the publishing of speeches delivered before the burgesses; on the contrary political authorship only now waxed copious, and it began to become a standing complaint at table that the host incommoded his guests by reading before them his latest orations. Publius Clodius had his speeches to the people issued as pamphlets, just like Gaius Gracchus; but two men may do the same thing without producing the same effect. The more important leaders even of the opposition, especially Caesar himself, did not often address the burgesses, and no longer published the speeches which they delivered; indeed they partly sought for their political fugitive writings another form than the traditional one of contiones, in which respect more especially the writings praising and censuring Cato (p. 436) are remarkable. This is easily explained. Gaius Gracchus had addressed the burgesses; now men addressed the populace; and as the audience, so was the speech. No wonder that the reputable political author shunned a dress which implied that he had directed his words to the crowd assembled in the Forum:

12.1

the

To subs diary historical literature belongs of sight also the

While the composition of orations thus declined from its former literary and political value in the same way as all branches of literature which were the natural growth of the national life, there began at the same time a singular, nonpolitical, literature of pleadings. Hitherto the Romans had known nothing of the idea that the address of an advocate as such was destined not only for the judges and the parties, but also for the literary edification of contemporaries and posterity; no advocate had written down and published his pleadings, unless they were possibly at the same time political orations, and in so far were fitted to be circulated as party writings, and Even Quintus Horten-

advocate in the first r speeches and these

early each as were unous or nail political. It was . the Roman har, Marcus Tullius : . . he outset quite as much author : . d his pleadings regularly, even when they were not at an or but remotely connected with politics. This was a token, not of progress, but of an unnatural and degenerate state of things. In Athens also the appearance of non-political pleadings among the forms of literature was a sign of debility, and it was doubly so in Rome, which did not like Athens by a sort of necessity produce this malformation through an exaggerated pursuit of rhetoric, but borrowed it from abroad arbitrarily and in antagonism to the better traditions of the nation. Yet this new species of literature carrie rapidly into vogue, partly because it had various points of contact and coincidence with the earlier authorship of political orations, partly because the unpoetic, dogmatical, thetatis and temperament of the Romans offered a favourable soil for the new seed, as indeed at the present day the speeches of advocates and even a sort of literature of lan-proceedings are of some importance in Italy.

Thus oratorical authorship emancipated from politics was naturalised in the Roman literary world by Cicero. We lave already had occasion several times to mertion this many bed man. As a statesman without rought, opinion, or purpose, he figured successively as democrat, as anstocrat, and as a tool of the monarchs, and was rever more than a short-sighted egitat. Where he exhibited the appearance of action, the questions to which his action applied had, as a rule, just mached their solution, thus he came forward in the trial of Verres against the senatorial judicia when they were already set as le, thus he was silent at the discussion on the Gabinian, and acted as a champion of the Manilian, law; thus he thundered against

Catilina when his departure was already settled, and so forth. He was valiant in opposition to sham attacks, and he knocked down many walls of pasteboard with a loud din; no serious matter was ever, either in good or evil, decided by him, and the execution of the Catilinarians in particular was far more due to his acquiescence than to his instigation. In a literary point of view we have already noticed that he was the creator of the modern Latin prose (p. 537); his importance rests on his mastery of style, and it is only as a stylist that he shows confidence in himself. In the character of an author, on the other hand, he stands quite as low as in that of a statesman. essayed the most varied tasks, sang the great deeds of Marius and his own petty achievements in endless hexameters, beat Demosthenes off the field with his speeches, and Plato with his philosophic dialogues; and time alone was wanting for him to vanquish also Thucydides. He was in fact so thoroughly a dabbler, that it was pretty much a matter of indifference to what work he applied his hand. By nature a journalist in the worst sense of that term-abounding, as he himself says, in words, poor beyond all conception in ideas-there was no department in which he could not with the help of a few books have rapidly got up by translation or compilation a readable essay. His correspondence mirrors most faithfully his character. People are in the habit of calling it interesting and clever; and it is so, as long as it reflects the urban or villa life of the world of quality; but where the writer is thrown on his own resources, as in exile, in Cilicia, and after the battle of Pharsalus, it is stale and empty as was ever the soul of a feuilletonist banished from his familiar circles. It is scarcely needful to add that such a statesman and such a littérateur could not, as a man, exhibit aught else than a thinly varnished superficiality and heartless-Must we still describe the orator? The great author is also a great man; and in the great orator more especially conviction or passion flows forth with a clearer and more impetuous stream from the depths of the breast than in the scantilygifted many who merely count and are nothing. Cicero had no conviction and no passion; he was nothing but an advocate, and not a good one. He understood how to set forth his narrative of the case with piquancy of ancedote, to excite, if not the feeling, at any rate the sentimentality of his hearers, and to enliven the dry business of legal pleading by cleverness or witticisms mostly of a personal sort; his better orations, though they are far from coming up to the free gracefulness and the sure point of the most excellent compositions of this sort, I instance the Memoirs of Beaumarchus, yet form easy and agreeable reading. But while the very advantages just indicated will appear to the serious judge as advantages of very dubious value, the absolute want of political discemment in the orations on constitutional questions and of juristic deduction in the forensic addresses, the egotism forgetful of its duty and constantly losing sight of the cause while thinking of the advocate, the dreadful barrenness of thought in the Cicronian orations must revolt every reader of feeling and judgment

If there is anything wonderful in the case, it is in truth not the orations, but the admiration which they excited. As to Cicero every unhiassed person will soon make up his mind Ciceronianism is a problem, which in fact cannot be properly solved, but can only be resolved into the greater mystery of human nature-language and the effect of language on the mind Inasmuch as the noble Latin language, just before it perished as a national idiom, was once more as it were compre hensively grasped by that devterous stylist and deposited in his copious writings, something of the power which language exercises, and of the piety which it awakens, was transferred to the unworthy vessel. The Romans possessed no great Latin prose writer, for Caesar was, like hapoleon, only incident it) an author Was it to be wondered at that, in the absence of such an one, they should at least honour the genius of the lar gunge in the great stylist? and that, like Cicero himself Cicero s readers also should accustom themselves to ask not what but how he had written? Custom and the schoolmaster then } completed what the power of language had begun

Cicero's contemporaries however were, as may readly to conceived, far less involved in this strange idolates than man of their successors. The Geromain manner ruled no doubt throughout a generation the Roman advocate-world joint at the first worse manner of Hostersius had done but the my considerable men, such as Caesar, kept themselves always aboff from it, and among the younger generation there are so in all men of fresh and living talent the most decaded opposition that habit and feeble rhetome. They found Cicero's language deficient in precision and chasteness, his jetts of controlled in the most arrangement deficient in clearners and arterilate division, and about all his whole eloquence was night to fir which makes the orator. Instead of the Rhod in originary new began to recur to the genume Attaconson, especially to firm it and Demosthenes, and sought to naturalise a more vigorous and masculine eloquence in Rome. Representatives of this tendency were, the solemn but stiff Marcus Junius Brutus  $\binom{669}{87} - \frac{712}{42}$ ; the two political partisans Marcus Caelius Rufus  $\binom{679}{872} - \frac{706}{48}$ ; p. 433) and Gaius Scribonius Curio  $(+\frac{705}{49}; \text{ pp. } 333, 370)$ —both as orators full of spirit and life; Calvus well known also as a poet  $\binom{672-706}{82-48}$ , the literary coryphaeus of this younger group of orators; and the earnest and conscientious Gaius Asinius Pollio  $(\frac{678}{76} = \frac{75}{4})$ . Undeniably there was more taste and more spirit in this younger oratorical literature than in the Hortensian and Ciceronian put together; but we are not able to judge how far, amidst the storms of the revolution which rapidly swept away the whole of this richly gifted group with the single exception of Pollio, those better germs attained development. The time allotted to them was but too brief. The new monarchy began by making war on freedom of speech, and soon wholly suppressed the political oration (p. 340). Thenceforth the subordinate species of the pure advocate-pleading was doubtless still retained in literature; but the higher art and literature of oratory, which thoroughly depend on political excitement, perished with the latter of necessity and for ever.

Lastly there sprang up in the aesthetic literature of this period the artistic treatment of subjects of professional science in the form of the stylistic dialogue, which had been very extensively in use among the Greeks and had been already employed also in isolated cases among the Romans (iii. 442). Cicero especially made various attempts at presenting rhetorical and philosophical subjects in this form and making the professional manual a suitable book for reading. His chief writings are the De Oratore (written in  $\frac{699}{55}$ ), to which the history of Roman eloquence (the dialogue Brutus written in  $\frac{708}{46}$ ) and other minor rhetorical essays were added by way of supplement; and the treatise De Republica (written in  $\frac{700}{64}$ ), with which the treatise De Legibus (written in  $\frac{702}{62}$ ?) after the model of Plato is brought into connection. They are no great works of art, but undoubtedly they are the works in which the excellences of the author are most, and his faults least, conspicuous. The rhetorical writings are far from coming up to the didactic chasteness of form and precision of thought of the Rhetoric dedicated to Herennius, but they contain instead a store of practical forensic experience and forensic anecdotes of all sorts easily and tastefully set forth, and in fact solve the problem of combining didactic instruction with amusement. The treatise De unhistorical, and besides not even peculiar to the author, but which, as may readily be conceived, became and remained popular. The scientific groundwork of these rhetorical and political writings of Cicero belongs of course entirely to the Greeks, and many of the details also, such as the grand concluding effect in the treatise De Republica, the Dream of Scipio, are directly borrowed from them, yet they possess comparative originality, inasmuch as the elaboration shows throughout Roman local colouring, and the proud consciousness of political life, which the Roman was certainly entitled to feel as compared with the Greeks, makes the author even confront his Greek instructors with a certain independence. The form of Cicero's dialogue is doubtless neither the genuine interrogative dialectics of the best Greek artificial dialogue nor the genuine conversational tone of Diderot or Lessing, but the great groups of advocates gathering around Crassus and Antonius and of the older and younger statesmen of the Scipionic circle furnish a lively and effective framework, fitting channels for the introduction of historical references and anecdotes, and convenient resting-points for the scientific discussion. The style is quite as elaborate and polished as in the best-written orations, and -- +he anthor does not often

tings of Cicero with a philosophic colouring are not devoid of ment, the compiler on the other hand completely failed, when in the involuntary

systems, Cicero stitched together the Epicurean, Score, Alic. Syncretist writings handling the same problem, as they came or were given to his hand, into a so-called dialogue. And all that he did on his own part was, to supply an introduction prefixed to the new book from the ample collection of prefaces for future works which he had beside him; to impart a certain popular character, masmuch as he interwive Roman examples and references, and sometimes digressed to subjects irrelevant but more familiar to the writer and the reader, such as the treatment of the deportment of the orator in the De Officiis; and to exhibit that sort of bungling which a man of letters, who has not attained to philosophic thinking or even to philosophic knowledge, and who works rapidly and boldly, shows in the reproduction of dialectic trains of thought. In this way no doubt a multitude of thick tomes might very quickly come into existence—"They are copies," wrote the author himself to a friend who wondered at his fertility; "they give me little trouble, for I supply only the words and these I have in abundance." Against this nothing further could be said; but any one who seeks classical productions in works so written can only be advised to study in literary matters a becoming silence.

Of the sciences only a single one manifested vigorous life, that of Latin philology. The scheme of linguistic and antiquarian research within the domain of the Latin race, planned by Stilo, was carried out especially by his disciple Varro on the grandest scale. There appeared comprehensive elaborations of the whole stores of the language, more especially the extensive grammatical commentaries of Figulus and the great work of Varro De Lingua Latina; monographs on grammar and the history of the language, such as Varro's writings on the usage of the Latin language, on synonyms, on the age of the letters, on the origin of the Latin tongue; scholia on the older literature, especially on Plautus; works of literary history, biographies of poets, investigations into the earlier drama, into the scenic division of the comedies of Plautus, and into their genuineness. Latin archaeology, which embraced the whole older history and the ritual law apart from practical jurisprudence, was comprehended in Varro's "Antiquities of Things Human and Divine," which was and for all times remained the fundamental treatise on the subject (published between  $\frac{687}{67}$  and  $\frac{709}{45}$ ). The first portion, "Of Things Human," described the primeval age of Rome, the divisions of city and country, the sciences of the years, months, and days, lastly, the public transactions at home and in war; in the second half, "Of Things Divine," the statetheology, the nature and significance of the colleges of experts, of the holy places, of the religious festivals, of sacrificial and votive gifts, and lastly of the gods themselves were summarily unfolded. Moreover, besides a number of monographs—e.g. on the descent of the Roman people, on the Roman gentes descended from Troy, on the tribes—there was added, as a larger and more independent supplement, the treatise "Of the Life of the Roman people"—a remarkable attempt at a history of Roman manners, which sketched a picture of the state of domestic life, finance, and culture in the regal, the early republican tile Hannibalic, and the most recent period. These labours

possessed—a knowledge to warma study of literature alike contributed. The eulogy of his contemporaries was well deserved, that Varro had enabled his country men—strangers in their own world—to know their position in their native land, and had taught the Romans who and where they were. But criticism and system will be sought for in vain the same to have come from somewhat they were.

traces that even in the Roman in the influence of the historical

romance of his time the matter is doubtless inserted in a convenient and symmetrical framework, but not classified of treated methodically, and with all his efforts to bring tradition and personal observation into harmony, the scientific labours of Varro are not to be acquitted of a certain implicit faith in tradition or of an unpractical scholasticism 1 The connection with Greek philology consists in the imitation of its defects more than of its excellences, for instance, the basing of etymo logies on mere similarity of sound both in Varro himself and in the other philologists of this epoch runs into pure guesswork and often into downright absurdity 2 In its empiric confidence and copiousness as well as in its empiric madequacy and want of method the Varronian vividly reminds us of the English national philology, and just like the latter, finds its centre in the We have already observed that the study of the older drama areal exposition reg rding satile in the res nine subdivisions of the le but true" fact that the sy the wind and generally historical, and agricu tu al

with its singular mixture or ,

Thus Varro derives facere from fanes, because he nho make anything gives to it an appearance soften the for after 5ths from other philos as the flying foother Gauss Trebbins, a phologogical client of this age derive saccilum from stare cells, I guide soft to saccilum from stare cells, I guide soft for saccilum from stare cells cells for saccilum from stare cells for saccilum from stare cells from saccilum from stare cells for saccilum from saccil monarchical literature developed the rules of language in contradistinction to this linguistic empiricism (p. 602). It is in a high degree significant that there stands at the head of the modern grammarians no less a man than Caesar himself, who in his treatise on Analogy (given forth between  $\frac{606}{68}$  and  $\frac{704}{66}$ ) first undertook to bring free language under the power of law.

Alongside of this extraordinary stir in the field of philology the small amount of activity in the other sciences is surprising. What appeared of importance in philosophy—such as Lucretius' representation of the Epicurean system in the poetical child-dress of the pre-Socratic philosophy, and the better writings of Cicero—produced its effects and found its audience not through its philosophic contents, but in spite of these solely through its aesthetic form; the numerous translations of Epicurean writings and the Pythagorean works, such as Varro's great treatise on the Elements of Numbers and the still more copious one of Figulus concerning the Gods, had beyond doubt neither scientific nor formal value.

Even the professional sciences were but feebly cultivated. Varro's Books on Husbandry written in the form of dialogue are no doubt more methodical than those of his predecessors Cato and Saserna—on which accordingly he drops many a side glance of censure—but have on the whole proceeded more from the study than, like those earlier works, from living experience. Of the juristic labours of Varro and of Servius Sulpicius Rufus (consul in  $\frac{7.03}{5.1}$ ) hardly aught more can be said, than that they contributed to the dialectic and philosophical embellishment of Roman jurisprudence. And there is nothing farther here to be mentioned, except perhaps the three books of Gaius Matius on cooking, pickling, and making preserves—so far as we know, the earliest Roman cookery-book, and, as the work of a man of rank, certainly a phenomenon deserving of notice. That mathematics and physics were stimulated by the increased Hellenistic and utilitarian tendencies of the monarchy, is apparent from their growing importance in the instruction of youth (p. 532) and from various practical applications; under which, besides the reform of the calendar (p. 524), may perhaps be included the appearance of wall-maps at this period, the technical improvements in shipbuilding and in musical instruments, designs and buildings like the aviary specified by Varro, the bridge of piles over the Rhine executed by the engineers of Caesar, and even two semicircular stages of boards arranged for being pushed together, and employed first separately as two theatres and then jointly as an amphitheatre. The public exhibition of foreign natural curiosities at the popular festivals was not unusual, and the descriptions of remarkable animals, which Caesar had embodied in the reports of his campaigns, show that, had an Aristotle appeared, he would have again found his patron prince But such literary performances as are mentioned in this department are essentially associated with Neopythagoreanism, such as the comparison of Greek and Barbanan, 1 e Egyptian, celestial observations by Figulus, and his writings concerning animals, winds, and generative organs After Greek physical research generally had swerved from the Aristotelian effort to find amidst the several facts their law, and had more and more passed into an empiric and mostly uncritical observation of the external and surprising in acture, natural science when coming forward as a mystical philosophy of nature, instead of enlightening and stimulating, could only still more stupely and paralyse, and in presence of such a method it was better to rest satisfied with the platitude which Cicero delivers as Socratic wisdom, that the investigation of nature either seeks after things which nobody can know, or after such things as nobody needs to know

If, in fine, we cast a glance at art, we discover here the same unpleasant phenomena which pervade the whole mental life of this period. Building on the part of the state was virtually brought to a total stand amudst the scarcity of money that marked the last age of the republic. We have already spoken others came into vogue at this time, and the marble-quarties of Luna (Carrara) were now employed for the first time—and began to inlay the filors of the rooms with mesaic work, to panel the walls with slabs of marble, or to paint the compart ments in imitation of marble—the first steps towards the subsequent freeso painting. But art was not a gainer by this lavish magnificence

In the arts of design connoisseurship and collecting were always on the increase. It was a mere affectation of Catomar simplicity, when an advocate spoke before the jurymen of the works of art "of a certain Praxiteles," every one travelled and inspected, and the trade of the art-circeron; or, as they were then called, the exegelae, was none of the worst. Ancient works of art were formally hunted after—statues and pictures less, it is true, than, in accordance with the rude character of Roman luxury, artistically wrought furniture and ornaments of all sorts for the room and the table. As early as that age the old Greek tombs of Capua and Corinth were ransacked for the sake of the bronze and earthenware vessels which had been placed in the tomb along with the dead. For a small statuette of bronze 40,000 sesterces (£400) were paid, and 200,000 (£2000) for a pair of costly carpets; a well wrought bronze cooking machine came to cost more than an estate. In this barbaric hunting after art the rich amateur was, as might be expected, frequently cheated by those who supplied him; but the economic ruin of Asia Minor in particular so exceedingly rich in artistic products brought many really ancient and rare ornaments and works of art into the market, and from Athens, Syracuse, Cyzicus, Pergamus, Chios, Samos, and other ancient seats of art, everything that was for sale and very much that was not migrated to the palaces and villas of the Roman grandees. We have already mentioned what treasures of art were to be found within the house of Lucullus, who indeed was accused, perhaps not unjustly, of having gratified his interest in the fine arts at the expense of his duties as a general. The amateurs of art crowded thither as they crowd at present to the Villa Borghese. and complained even then of such treasures being confined to the palaces and country houses of the grandees, where they could be seen only with difficulty and after special permission from the possessor. The public buildings on the other hand were far from filled in like proportion with famous works of Greek masters, and in many cases there still stood in the temples of the capital nothing but the old images of the gods carved in wood. As to the exercise of art there is virtually nothing to report; there is hardly mentioned by name from this period any Roman sculptor or painter except a certain Arellius, whose pictures rapidly went off not on account of their artistic value. but because the cunning reprobate furnished in his pictures of the goddesses faithful portraits of his mistresses for the time being.

The importance of music and dancing increased in public as in domestic life. We have already set forth how theatrical music and the dancing-piece attained to an independent standing in the development of the stage at this period (p. 549); we may add that now in Rome itself representations were very frequently given by Greek musicians, dancers, and declaimers on the public stage—such as were usual in Asia Minor and generally in the whole Hellenic and Hellenising world.1 To these fell to be added the musicians and dancing-girls, who exhibited their arts to order at table and elsewhere, and the special choirs of stringed and wind instruments and singers which were no longer rare in noble houses. But that even the world of quality itself played and sang with diligence, is shown by the very adoption of music into the cycle of the generally recognised subjects of instruction (p. 532); as to dancing, it was, to say nothing of women, made matter of reproach even against consulars that they exhibited themselves in dancing performances amidst a small circle. Towards the end of this period, however, there appears with the commencement of the monarchy the beginning of a better time also in art. We have already mentioned the mighty stimulus which building in the capital received, and building

"Croal entertainments" were very frequent not merely in the for Afplis 3, 10; Flut Bn!

I Flum vii. 3, 3 d All
When the well known throughout the empire was destined to receive, through Caesar. Even in the cutting of the dies of the coins there appears about  $\frac{700}{54}$  a remarkable change; the stamping, hitherto for the most part rude and negligent, is thenceforward managed with more delicacy and care.

We have reached the end of the Roman republic. We have seen it rule for five hundred years in Italy and in the countries on the Mediterranean; we have seen it brought to ruin in politics and morals, religion and literature, not through outward violence, but through inward decay, and thereby making room for the new monarchy of Caesar. There was in the world. as Caesar found it, much of the noble heritage of past centuries and an infinite abundance of pomp and glory, but little spirit, still less taste, and least of all true delight in life. It was indeed an old world; and even the richly-gifted patriotism of Caesar could not make it young again. The dawn does not return till after the night has fully set in and run its course. But yet with him there came to the sorely harassed people on the Mediterranean a tolerable evening after the sultry noon; and when at length after a long historical night a new day dawned once more for the peoples, and fresh nations in free self-movement commenced their race towards new and higher goals, there were found among them not a few, in which the seed sown by Caesar had sprung up, and which were and are indebted to him for their national individuality.

INDEX

Accius, Lucius, iii. 421, 443 Acerræ, battle of, iii. 228, 229 Achæans, ii. 66, 69, 205, 207, 219-20, 226, 232, 233, 343, 245, 260-63, 273, 275; iii. 19, 42-47 Achæans in Italy, i. 131, 134-36 Adriatic, i. 138; ii. 66-69 Aduatuci, iv. 218, 233, 234-35, 246, Aediles, i. 270, 271, 273 and n. I; curule, i. 296, 451 Æmilianus, Q. Fabius Maximus, iii. 10, 15 Æmilius Lepidus, M., ii. 216, 217; iv. 16, 17, 21, 23, 24; iv. 359 Æmilius Papus, L., ii. 72, 73; Paulus, L., ii. 70, 119, 120-22; ii. 197, 281, 282, 317, 318, 325; iii. 413 Æmilius Scaurus, M., iii. 137, 201, 206, 208, 223, 380, 382; law of, iii. 127, 129 Æqui, i. 342, 343 Æthalia (Elba), i. 139, 140 Ætolians, ii. 66, 123, 141-3, 205 et seq., 259, 266, 275, 292 Afranius, Lucius, iii. 426; iv. 127, 183, 191, 271, 359, 360, 373, 396, 410, 420 Africa (see also Carthage); Roman province, iii. 37, 323, 324; iv. 421; wars of Cæsar in, iv. 368-70, 372, 373, 409-12, 415-21; under Cæsar, iv. 513 Agathocles of Syracuse, i. 323, 378, Agrarian laws, Flaminian, iii. 93; Cassian, iii. 92; Sempronian, iii. 85, 87, 90, 91, 92, 95, 103; Gracchan, iii. 103, 394 Agriculture, i. 15, 16, 18-21 and n., 185 et seq., 437, 438; ii. 341-4, 348, 357, 366, 367, 383; iv. 478-80, 497, 498 Agrigentum, ii. 26, 34 Agylla. See Caere Alalia, battle of, i. 144, 145, 319; 11. 5 Alban range, i. 33, 37 Alba, i. 37, 38, 40 and n. 2, 86 and Archimedes, ii. 136, 137

n. 1, 100 and n. 2, 102-5, 374; battle of, 333 Albanians, the, i. 10, n. 3; iii. 164 Alesia, siege of, iv. 259-61 Alexander of Jerusalem, iv. 141, Alexander the Molossian, i. 359-60 Alexandria, ii. 201, 203, 219, 289; death of Pompeius at, iv. 399, 400; Cæsar at, iv. 400-6 Alexandrian literature, iv. 533, 543-6 Allia, battle of, i. 331, 332 Allobroges, iii. 158, 159; 200, 204, 219, 221 Alphabet, Etruscan and Latin. i. 201, 202, 213 et seq. Alps, Hannibal's passage of. 98-103 Andronicus, L. Livius, ii. 395, 396, 412, 427; iii. 415 Antigonus Doson of Macedonia, ii. 69, 70, 89, 123 Antioch, iv. 43, 44 Antiochus Asiaticus, king of Syria, iv. 58, 62, 126, 127 Antiochus the Great, ii. 140, 209, 211, 216, 224, 236, 237 et seq., war of, with Rome, 243 267; et seg. Antiochus Epiphanes, ii. 276, 289, 388; iii. 50, 55, 57, 58, 64 Antiochus of Syracuse, historian, i. 31 Antonius, M., iv. 50, 69, 95 Antonius Marcus, iv. 144, 145, 169, 170, 336, 350, 355, 371, 382, 434 Appian road, iii. 379 Aquae Sextiae (Aix), iii. 160; iv. 202; battle of, iii. 179-80, 181, Aqueducts, Roman, iii. 380 Aquileia, ii. 183, 271, 313; iii. 161; iv. 271 Aquillius, Manius, iii. 134, 135, 259, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277 Arausio, battle of, iii. 172, 173, 174 Archelaus, iii. 280 et seq., 325

History of Rome

Architecture, 1 234 7, 467, 463 and Belgae, m. 178, 11 212, 213 219, n I, 11. 449, 111 447

Aremoricans, 11 231, 235 Aretas of the Nabatæans, W. 125,

Anovistus, German leader, 19 128, 129, 130 220-2, 228 31, 275

Aristion, iii 280, 281, 282, 283 Aristobulus, n 125, 128, 129, 142,

Anstotle cited on Cartbage, n 14,

Armenia, iu. 258, 268, 309 el seg; conquest of, by Pompeius, iv 114, 129; war of, with Rome,

11 57 et seg , 64 6 See Roman Army Art, Etruscan, 1 469-73

Art, Italian, 1 227 et seq 467, 469, Art, Roman, 1 198, 474, it 449-50, ni 446 et seq , 11 582 5 Artaxata, 12 65, 66, 113

Arval Brethren, 1 43, 223, 225 Arvern, m 157, 158, 159, 160, 173. 1V 212, 213, 219, 250 d seq

Asia, Roman conquests in, iv 132 d seq, 197, taxation of, n 140,

Roman province of, m 141 As1a. taxa-

378, 379, 11 90, 95, 132 tion of, in 108, 110, 114, 115 Isia (or Syria) kingdom of, ii 200, 202, 356, in 56 et seq , fall of,

Asia Minor, iii. 239, 277, 253, 19 35, 42 57, nationalities in, in

Athens, 11 206, 217, stege of, 111 Atilius, Lucius, przetor, il. 105

Arthus Serranus, A., u 243 Attalids, ii 267, iii. 19 41 49-52, 87, 162, kingdom of, u 285, 286, ni 257, 259 Attalus, King of Pergamus, ii 142, 205, 206, 212, 214, 216, 217, 221,

Aurelia, mother of Julius Casar, iv Aurelian law, new, 15 90

Aurelian road, u. 185, 111 379 Ausculum, battle of, 1 397-9 Avaricum, 11 253, 254 Aventme Hill, L 51, 55, 108, 109,

110 and n 1, 112, 113, 170, 279 Avignon, 11 96, 97

Bedoums, iv 122, 123

231, 244, 264 Bellovaci, r. 232, 233, 257, 263,

264, 265 Beneventum, battle of, 1. 406

Berbers, the, 11. 190-2 Betuntus, King of the Arverni, iti.

Bibracte, it 259, battle of, iv 226,

Bibulus, Marcus, 18 188, 189 190, 291, 304, 318, 375 377, 370, 381 Bithynia becomes Roman, 14 48,

Black Sea, peoples on, in 264 6

Bocchus, king of Mauretania, in 139, 140, 148, 149-50

Bon, il. 70, 71, 74, 92, 93, 105, 181, 182, 183, 184, ill. 163 and n 1,

Bosperus, kingdom of, iil 268 Bovianum, capture of, L 371

Britain, n 204, 213, invaded by Carsar, 1v 241, 242 Brundssum, 11 66, 135, 141, siege

Bruttu, the, i 9, 31; in 124, 153,

Brutus, Decimus, w 236, 237, 366

Brutus, Junius, 1 246 n 1 Brutus, Jaccus, in 442 Burgesses of Rome, amalgamatica of with the Mitoeci, 1 86, 91

Burn'l customs, 1 199, 224, 227, Byzantium, 11. 273, 276, 208, 219,

245 Cabira, battle of, is 54, 45, 56, 59

Caecilius, Statius, comedian, 11. 399 Cachus Rueus, M , 1v 433

Catre (Agylla), L 125, 126, 120, 140, 145, 240, 307, 334, 471, 473, tombs at, 1 197, 200, 201, 216,

Carsar, Gains, Iri. 245, 303 235, 245 6

Carsar, Gaius Julius, early career et, 14 5, 33, 50, 85, 88, 105, 148, 151, and Crassus, iv 153 d sty. and the Catilinarian plot it 16 league cl. 170-3 and n 1, 175, league cl, with Pompeius and Crassus, it 184 7, 288-9, 321; and Pompeine, 100, 192, 280-1, 319 # 147, in Gaul, 10 191, 222 41, 245-65, 280 290, 293, 326, invasors ty, of Britain, it 241, 241, * 27 Cf, with Pompeius and successors, iv. 340 et seq.; as Imperator, iv. 441-8; character of, iv. 424-31; as democrat, iv. 149, 180, 322, 438-9; as general, iv. 341-4, 427-8; "Gallic War" of, iv. 301, 571-2.

Caesar, Lucius, iv. 157 Caesar, Lucius Julius, iii. 227 et seg., 235, 245, 303, 420; law of, iii.

233 and n. I, 234 Caesarian legions, mutiny of, iv.

414-5 Calendar, Roman, i. 466-7; Caesar's reform of, iv. 524

Calpurnius, Gaius, ii. 197

Camillus, Marcus Furius, i. 292, 295, 329, 333, 436 Cannae, battle of, ii. 120-2, 141, 153

Canuleian Law, i. 287

Capital and labour, conflict between,

iii. 72-3, 79

Capitalists, Roman, ii. 243-4, 355 et seq., 359 et seq.; iii. 22, 38, 49, 63, 64-5, 72-3, 75, 79, 106 et seq., 130, 130, 142, 161, 174, 197, 202, 205, 208, 210, 232-3, 296, 305, 332, 384, 385-6; iv. 4, 94-5, 186,

Capitol, i. 51, 52, 109 and n., 110

and n. r

Capitoline Hill, i. 55, 108 Cappadocia, iii. 53-4, 269, 271

Capua, i. 323, 350, 352, 354, 356-7, 366, 421; ii. 26, 115, 116, 124, 131, 132, 177; siege and fall of, ii. 156-9

Carrhae, battle of, iv. 314-5, 319 Carthage, ii. 6-25, 58-60, 78 et seq., 186 et seq., 358; iii. 19, 21 et seq., 75, 104, 251, 386, 389, 396; iv. 513, 516; maritime supremacy of, i. 409; ii. 13, 18, 24-5, 34; rise of, i. 144; and Sicily, i. 320, 322, 400, 403 et seq.; Roman wars with, ii. 31 et seq., 88 et seq.; iii. 22-38; fall of, iii. 35-7

Carthaginians, i. 201, 348; allies of the Etruscans, i. 319, 320-1

Cassian law, iii. 69, 82

Cassian road, ii. 184; iii. 379 Cassius, L., iii. 272, 276, 277, 279; law of, iii. 81;

Cassius, Quintus, iv. 336 Cassius, Špurius, i. 278-9, 292, 338, ii. 337 Cassivellaunus, iv. 242-3, 244, 313

Catilina, Lucius, iv. 154 et seq.; conspiracy of, iv. ib., 161-73

Cato, M. Porcius, the elder, ii. 197,

199, 246-7, 288, 301, 308, 316 et seq., 342, 365, 381-3; iii. 8, 22, 23, 32, 93, 418; character and career of, ii. 327-9; writings of, ii. 433, 435, 236, 439, 446, 448; iii.

44I Cato, M. Porcius, the younger, iv. 146-8, 151, 168, 179, 180 et seq., 295, 303-4, 323, 367-8, 373, 375, 377, 389, 396, 410 et seq.; death of, iv. 420, 422-3

Catonian party and Pompeius, iv. 324-5, 331, 333-4

Catulus, G. Lutatius, ii. 51, 52; iii. 180 et seq., 227, 304, 435; son, iv. 8, 22, 24, 84, 101, 103, 105, 151, 180

Catullus, Q. Valerius, iv. 300-1, 557-8

Caucasus, limit of Roman conquest. iv. 118; peoples of, iv. 115 et seq. Caudium, Convention of, i. 364-5 Celts, i. 324-5, 334-5, 375; ii. 202, 205, 255-6; iv. 201 et seq., 268-9; wars with, ii. 70-7, 177, 181-5; iii. 157 et seq., 163 et seq.; capture of Rome by, i. 413; migrations of, i. 325-7 and n.

Censorship, i. 289-90, 309, 313-4, 296, 423, 427; ii. 301-2, 304; iii. 70, 339, 342, 348-9, 362; iv. 90 Centuries, i. 95; assembly of, i. 254,

258, 28r; share of, in the constitution, i. 96

Cephallonia, island of, ii. 260 Chaeronea, battle of, iii. 285-6 Chalcedon, siege of, iv. 51

Chalcis, ii. 200, 220, 246, 247 Chersonesus, city of, iii. 266, 267.

Cicero, M. Tullius, iv. 5, 85, 103, 148, 159, 162, 167-8, 171, 194-5, 283, 294-5, 303, 411, 537-8, 574-9 Cilicia, piracy of, iii. 62, 74, 131, 257; iv. 17, 39, 41, 43, 46, 107; a Roman province, iii. 131 and n.

1,257,271; iv. 133 Cimbri, iii. 167-70; wars with, iii. 130, 134, 170-1, 172-3, 178-82, 361

Cincinnatus, L. Q., i. 291

Cineas, i. 391, 395-6, 402 Cinna, L. Cornelius, iii. 255, 256, 297 et seq., 304; iv. 15; revolutionary government of, 306 et seq.;

Lucius, the younger, iv. 22 Cirta (Constantine), ii. 192; iii. 138,

139; iv. 417, 421, 513 Cities, Asiatic, founded by Pompeius, iv. 136-7

Civilisation of Graeco-Italians, i. 18 [ Corsica, 1. 146, 409; 11. 38, 61, 62, d seq; Indo-Germanic, 1 14-7. 22, of Greece and Rome, compared, t. 23 et seq Clan-constitution of ancient Rome,

1 75-8 Clan-districts or cantons of Latins.

1 35 9 Clans or gentes, Roman, 1, 24, 60-2.

68, 86 and n , 186, 188 Claudian law, u 354, 363 Claudu, the, 475 88

Claudius, Appius (Censor), 1 367. 379, 396, 443, 454, 463, 465, reform of, 1 305, 450, it 331, (Consul), in 83, 84, 87, 95, 157,

decemvir, 1 282-3 Claudius, Nero, G . it. 157, 164-5, 167 Cleopatra, IV, 399, 407, 402, 406, 426 ents (see also Metocci), or bisteners" 1 61 2, 11 322-3, Chents (see

origin of the Plebs, 1 90-1 Clodius, Publius, 1v 194 5, 277 81,

289, 294, 303 Clusium, 1 330 Comage, Italian, i

nnage, Italian, i 439, 444 5, Roman, 1 438 9, 444 5; il. 358 o, 111. 388-90, IV 522 4 Colonies, Latin, 1 408, 416-7 Colonisation, Roman, in 78-9, 103-4.

110, 115, 125 196, 204, 209, 336; IV 474 5, 511-14, 515 Comitia, the, 1 306-8, 111 92 3, 1v.

150 Comitia Centuriata, 1. 305, 306, III. 103, reform of, il. 331-4

Comitia Tributa, 1 281, 305, 306, 307, и 303, 333, и. 340

Commerce, i 196-204, 439-41; if. 358 9 364, 111 384-5, iv 519; of Etruscans, 1. 143, of Greeks in

Itals, i 136 et seq Consulship, i 246 and n et seq, 256, 260, 273 4, 309, 11. 61, 304; 111 70, 342, 343 7, re-election to, m

Corcyra, ii. 206

Corfinium, in 224, 237, 1V 352-3 Corinth, 11, 200, 226, 228, 45, 47-9, 3%, iv 514, 516
Corn distribution, iii. 102-3, 110, 213, 115, 117, 337, 349, 382, iv 4, 22, 83 4, 174, 283, 466 d seq
Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi, iii.

83, 94, in 122; letters of, ill. 442 Cornelia, wife of Julius Caesar, iv

Cornelian laws, iv. 1

186 Cotta, Lucius, practor, iv 90

Marcus, 1v 49, 50-1, 54 Cotys, 1L 272, 277, 278, 284,

Thracian prince, iv 272 Crassus, Lucius Licinius, m. 194, 208, 213, 218, 415, 417, 447

Crassus, Marcus, son of Publius,

iii. 308, 312, 318, 321, 322, 333 Crassus, Marcus iv 12 14, 77 8, 149, and Caesar, iv 153 et seq, and Pompeius, iv 88-9, 92 4, and the Catilinarian plot, iv 170-3, 175, one of the triumvirate, iv 184 7, 288-91, 321; Parthian war of, iv 293, 308 17, death of, iv 316 Crassies, P. Liemius, Consul, ii. 277,

278, Publius, 111 227, 228, 303;

Publics, son of Marcus, iv 223, 230, 235, 238, 241, 311, 314 Cremera, battle of, L 323

Cremona, 11, 27, 181, 184

Crete, in. 257, iv 42, 69, 70, 82, 108, 132, piracy of, in 62, 74, under Rome, iv 71, 133

Ctesiphon, iv 311 Culture, Roman, rv 532 9

Cumae, 1. 116, 125, 131, 132, 137, 139, 350, 351; 11 131, 132; battle of, 1 321, 323, 11 5 Curies, 1 66, 67, 69, 96, 253-4, 557

Curio, G , 1v. 332 3, 348, 350, 355, 367 70 Curius Dentatus, M , 1 379

Curius, Manius, i 303, 304, 305, 406, 443, 11 304, 328

Cybele, cultus of, if 379, 351; hil

Cynocephalae, battle of, it, 228-10, Cyprus, 11l. 19, 20, 36, 257, iv 142,

143, 195, 401, 406 Cyrene, Roman province, iv 48 Cyricus, in 208, 241, 17 51 2 135

Dalmatians, in. 161-2, 164, 165, 166; IV 272, 397, 409

Dancing, 1. 222, 226, 230, 233 Dead, burning of, L 277 Debt, Isw of, 1 153 5, 160, 267 8, 260, 275, 281, 300, 301, 428

Debtots, iv 487, 493 7 Decemvirs, 1 279-81 Declus, Mus, Publius, L 375, 376, 377

Deiotarus, ly 134 Demetrius of Pharos, Il 63, 69, 92,

123; ili 162 Dentatus, L. Siecius, 1 282

Dictatorship, i. 252, 284, 296, 310, Etruscans, i. 9, 114, 115, 185, 202, 315; abolition of, ii. 335-6 277, 342, 369, 370, 376, 377, 386, Dionysius of Syracuse, ii. 13; the elder, i. 409, 322, 350; ii. 14 Divitiacus, iv. 220, 225 Divorce in Rome, iii. 394; iv. 489-90 Dolabella, P., iv. 433-4 Domitian highway, iii. 380 Domitius Ahenobarbus, L., iv. 287, 297, 352, 356, 367, 374, 376, 396 Domitius Calvinus, G., iv. 386-7, 388, Drama, Latin, iii. 420-31; iv. 546-50 Roman, i. 452; ii. 393-4, 396 et Drepana, ii. 45, 48, 51; battle of, ii. 46-7 Dress, Graeco-Italian, i. 22 Drusus, M. Livius, tribune, iii. 117; laws of, iii. 118, 125 Drusus, M. Livius, the younger, iii. 207; reforms of, iii. 208-10, 218-9; frustrated, iii. 211, 219, 241 Dumnorix, iv. 225, 244 Dyrrhachium, iv. 381-6 Eburones, iv. 234, 245-7, 249 Education, Greek, iii. 413-4; Latin, iii. 414; Roman, ii. 391 Egnatian highway, iii. 41, 380 Egypt, ii. 66, 140, 200 et seq., 288-9; iii. 19, 55, 56, 257; iv. 43, 45-6, 48, 122, 142-5, 156-7, 286, 309, 396, ` 399-406, 452, 514 Elections, iii. 341-2; iv. 296-8; agitations as to, iii. 70-1; controlled by Pompeius, iv. 302, 304, Ennius, ii. 423-6, 429-31, 435, 438, 446; iii. 401, 415, 418, 421; iv. 551 et seq. Ephesus, ii. 240, 243, 247, 254; iii. Equestrian Order (see also Equites), ii. 364; iii. 106-8; judicial powers of, iii. 109, 197, 205, 207, 208, 210, 211, 338, 351; iv. 90, 91, 456 Equites, ii. 298-301, 302; iii. 106-7 Erastosthenes, ii. 14 Ercte, Mt., ii. 49-50 Etruria, iii. 335, 336; iv. 23; war with, i. 246; fall of, i. 329, 333-4, 336-7; ii. 13 Etruscan art, i. 233, 234, 237-8, 239, 240, 469-73; civilisation, i. 335-6; language, i. 11, 12, 13, 119-21;

magic, i. 433; music, i. 452, 453; poets, i. 234; religion, i. 181-4;

11. 378, 379, 380

391, 397; ii. 5; commerce of, i. 143, 200-1; constitution of, 126-7; maritime power of, i. 123, 126, 142 143, 145, 146, 147, 319, 409; fall of, 321, 323, 327; relations of, with Rome, i. 100, 107, 124-6; settlements of, i. 122-4; war of, with Rome, i. 319-20 Euergetes II., ii. 289 Eunienes of Pergamus, ii. 241, 245, 250, 254, 257-8, 266, 271, 273, 274, 276, 285-6 Eumenes II., iii. 41, 50-1, 54 Fabii, the, i. 277, 323 Fabius Maximus, Q., Cunctator, ii. 113, 115, 119, 126, 132, 154, 160, 172, 335, 450; iii. 159 Fabricius, G., i. 304, 305; i. 388, 397, 401, 402 Facsulac, iv. 161 Family, see Roman family Fannius, Lucius, iv. 49, 66, 67 Favonius, M., iv. 295 Fidenae, i. 99-100, 107, 125, 323, 328 Flaminian road, ii. 76, 184; iii. 379 Flaminio-Aemilian road, iii. 379 Flaminius, G., ii. 109, 110, 111, 112, 115, 126, 127; ii. 330, 333, 337, 363 Flaminius, L. Q. consul, ii. 308 Flaminius, T. Quinctius, ii. 224 et seq., 239, 240, 241, 244, 245, 248, 251, 260-1, 262, 264, 268 Flavius Fimbria, G., iii. 290, 291, 294, 305-6, 309, 310, 330 Franchise, Roman, i. 415 et seq.; classes admitted to, ii. 311-3, 320-1; claims to, iii. 209, 210, 215; laws granting, iii. 233, 234-5; and Italy, iii. 115, 116, 117, 241-2; concession of, iii. 301, 340-1, 364; extension of, iv., 514-5 and n., 517 Freehold suffrage, i. 305-6 Freeholders, duties of, 185-6, 195 Fregellae, i. 361, 365, 367, 396; ii. 163; 111. 100, 116, 118, 210, 216, 219 Fulvius Flaccus, M., iii. 95, 98, 100, 116, 120-1, 125, 157, 196 Fulvius Nobilior, M., ii. 259, 439,

Gabinian law, iii. 69; iv. 106, 108,

Gabinius, Aulus, iv. 127, 142, 144,

Gabinian road, iii. 380

Livian laws, iii 118, 124, 212 Livius, Gaius, 11 246, 249, 250, Marcus, 11 164, 165, 167 Luca, IV 288, 291, 292, 297, 308,

319, 321 Lucani, the, i 31

Lucanian canton, 1 244 Lucanians, 1 350, 352, 359, 361, 362, 372, 373, 375, 378, 386, 388, 393, 394, 395, 402, 405, 407 Luceria 1 366, 367

Lucilius, Gaius, saturist, in 415, 419, 432 5, 443, 448 Lucretius Carus, T , poet, IV 551 4

Lucretius, Gaius, ii 277, 278 279 Lucullus, L. Licinius, iii 284 289, 290, 325 431, 1V 8, 9, 49 et seq, 77, 81, 90, 95, 96 101, 102, 109 1, 124, 126 et seg , 146, 179, 183 Lucullus, Marcus III 318, 319, 431,

IV 8, 36, 73, 77, 151
Lupercalia, 1 44, 52 n 1, 163 169
Luperer guilds of 1 43, 44, 52 and

1 1, 84, 86, 169 Lusitanians, in 4 et seq , 1v 18 9 Lutetia (Paris), ly 255, 258

Lyous, the, battle on, IV 112 3 Lysimachia, 11 211, 230, 239, 240, 252 111 162

Maccabees, 111 58, 1V 123, 124 Maccabenia, 11 66, 67, 69 92, 123 4, acedonia, ii 60, 07, 167, 200-2, 134 135, 140 et seq , 167, 206, 266, 267, 206, 219 231, 258, 260, 266, 267, 111 19, 270 et seg, 292, 374, ii 19, 38-9 279 et seg, 292, 374, ii 19, 38-9 279 et seq, 281, 308, fall of, il 283 4, iii 162, Roman province of, iii 40-1, 162, iv 36, Pompeius in, iv 375 9, civil war

Macedonian wars, it 141 et seq , 178, 213 et seq , 275 83, 308

Maelius, Spurius, 1 290 Maenian law 1 297 Magistracy, limitation of power of,

1 243, 244 5, 247 et seg Magistrates in Caesarian Rome, iv Magnesia, battle of 11 253 5 Mago, Carthaginlan, II 18, brother of Hannibal, it. 83 108, 111, 146, 149 et seg , 166, 167, 172, clan of, Mamertines, 1 393, 401, 407 8, il

27 et seq . 65 ancinus, G H, iiL 14 5, 66, 84 Mancinus, G. H., iii. Nanilian law, Iv. 109 Manilius, Galus, iv 103, 105, 162, 163, 165

Manihus, M , 1v 149 Manhus, Lucius, iv 18, 199, Marcus, i. 292 3, 332, Titus, i 355 Marcellus, M Claudius, ii 128, 130 et seg , 154, 160-1, 450, 111 6-7, nv 325, 375, 435 Marcius, G (Coriolanus) 1, 276 Marcius, Philippus, L., ii 279 287, iii 130, 208, 210, 306, 312, 323, 327, 1V 7, 24 25

Marius Gaius, ini 242 3 247 8, 250-1, 332, 348, 360-1, 410, 411, lv 151 2, 225, early career of, iii. 184 et seq, tribune, ni 126, 143, 223, 235 6, consul, ni. 148, wars ol, id 135, 145 6, 149 et seq , 177 82, 184, 227, 229-30, as revolu tonust, m 187 203, return of, to

Rome, 111 299 et seg , death of, Marius, the younger, 111 243 315,

Marriage, 1 21 m, 281, 287, ii 389 mi 394, iv 490, laws, i 89 and m 1, 160, 428 Mars, worship of i 52, 53 and m 1, 84, 86, 165 and m 1, 106, 168-9

Marsians, i. 9, 11, 13 117 Marsian war, see Social war

Massilia, i. 144, 146, ii. 192, iii. 156-7, 160, iv 200, 201, 347, 365 7, 379 Massinissa of Cirta, 11 145, 146, 147, 152, 170 et seq , 174, 186 187, 189, 101, 271, 291, ili 21 et seq. 135 Mediolanum (Milan), 1 327, il. 75 Medierranean Sea, historical aspect of, L 3 4, Roman supremacy in,

il. 177, 307 Melpum, i 327, 329 Memmus, Gaius, in 139, 140, 194 Menapil, iv 248

Messana, n 26 27, 28, 32, 33, 37 Metaurus, the, battle of ii 165 Metellus, G Caecilus, ii 45 Metellus L (Dalmaticus), iii 166

Metellus, Nepos Q iv 175 81
Metellus, Nepos Q iv 175 85
Metellus, Pins, Q in 120, 256
d seq, iv 8, 9, 18, 19 20, 26
d seq, 70-1 77, 52, 27, 59
Metellus, Q Caccillus iii 13, 18,
Metellus, Q Caccillus iii 13, 18, 39 40, 43 et seg , 84, 87, 95, 97, 9

27 30, 33 ct 364, 34, 77, 73, 74, 75, 120, 143 ct 364, 194, 195, 197, 1203, 308, 312, 313, 6447, 17, 10, 108, 132, 146, 151, 109

179 Metellus, Scipio, Q, iv 302, 306, 307, 320, 321, 337, 379, 356-7, 3 7, 396, 410, 411, 417, 418, 420

Metocci, i. 86, 91, 244, 257 Military system (see also Roman armý), i. 433-7; ii. 300, 303; iii. 104, 154-5, 171, 177, 214; iv. 458-65, 469-70; re-organised Marius, iii. 187-91 Milo, Epirot, general, i. 301, 392, 402, Milo, T. Annius, iv. 302-6, 432, 433 Minucius, M., ii. 116, 118 Mithradates I., of Parthia, iii. 58, 60r; iv. 309 Mithradates of Pergamus, iv. 404-5, 408 Mithradates V., of Pontus, iii. 54 Mithradates VI., King of Pontus, ii. 291; iii. 204, 223, 224, 239, 259 ct seq., 325, 361; iv. 31, 35, 40-8; wars of, with Rome, iii. 271-2, 275, 309; iv. 48 et seq., 62 et seq., 110, 195; death of, iv. 121 Monarchy, abolition of, i. 244 et seq. Monarchy, the new, beginnings of, under the regents, iv. 296; Rome, iv. 422, 424; constitution of, iv. 448 et seq. Monetary system, Roman, iii. 388-91 Mons Albanus, i. 39 Mons Saeer, secessions to, i. 269-70, 282 Mueianus, P. Crassus, iii. 82, 84, 95 Mueius Scaevola, P., iii. 83, 88, 95, 97; history by, iii. 440; law by, iii. 446 Mucius Scaevola, Q., iii. 205-6, 218, 253, 306, 317, 408 Mummius, Lucius, iii. 430 Murena, L. Lieinius, iii. 283, 294, 325, 366; iv. 35, 41, 47, 54 Music, i. 222 et seq., 227 and n., 233, 452, 453; iii. 447-8; iv. 583-4 Mutilus, G. Papius, iii. 227 et seq., 238, 239, 322 Nabateans, iv. 122, 125, 129-30 Nabis of Sparta, ii. 207, 227, 232-4, 242-3 Naevius, Gnaeus, ii. 405-6, 411-3, 426, 428, 435, 448; iii. 415, 418, 420, 422 Narbo (Narbonne), colony, iii. 125, 160, 161; Roman province, iii. 374, 397, 385, 386; iv. 202, 512 Navigation, learnt from Greeks, i. Naxos, i. 131, 132 Neapolis, iii. 235 Nervii, iv. 205, 218, 233, 244, 246-7, 248

New Carthage (Cartagena), ii. 84, 90, 93, 149-50, 192; iii. 4 Nicomedes II, of Bithynia, iii. 269; III., iii. 272, 273, 274, 276 Nobility, Roman, ii. 296 et seq., 302 Nola, iii. 299, 301, 322 Nomentuni, i. 99 Non-Latins, subjugation of, ii. 178 Norbanus, G., iii. 175 n. 1, 203 Novius, iii. 428, 429 Numa, King, i. 168, 189, 195 Numantia, iii. 6, 13; fall of, iii. 16-7 Numidia, iii. 19, 37, 135 et seq. Numidian war, iii. 361 Octavius, Gnaeus, iii. 255, 295, 300, 302, 303 Octavius, Marcus, tribune, iii. 86-7. 111-2; iv. 408, 409, 410, 412 Odysseus, legend of, i. 139 and n. 1. Ofella, Q., iii. 327, 356-7, 359 Ogulnian law, i. 297, 298 Oligarchy, opposition to, iv. 3-5; and fall of, iv. 104 Opimius, Lucius, iii. 118 et seq., 124. 138, 142 Oppius, Q., iii. 276, 277 Optimates, iii. 71-2, 81, 161; iv. 5 Orehomenus, battle of, iii. 287-8 Ostia, port of Rome, i. 46, 47, 94, 101; iii. 381, 385, 411 Ovinian law, i. 314, 315 Paeuvius, Marcus, iii. 419, 420-1 Palatine Hill, early city on, i. 48-50, 53, 54-5, 94, 108, 109, 110 and n. 2 Panaetius of Rhodes, iii. 406, 414, Panormus, ii. 44; battle of, ii. 37. 45. 5I Panticapacum, iv. 119, 120 Papirian law, iii. 69 Papirius Carbo, Gaius, iii. 95, 98, 99, 100, 124; iii. 233; iii. 322 Papirius Carbo, Gnaeus, iii. 170, 297, 300, 309, 311, 313, 315, 316, 323 Papirius Cursor, L., i. 365, 366, 370; son of, 378 Parthian war, iv. 293, 308-19 Parthians, iii. 58-61, 258, 259, 271-2; iv. 42, 110, 130-2, 140, 348 Pastoral husbandry, ii. 343-4, 349, 353 et seq., 366; iii. 73-5; iv. 479-Patricians, i. 258; contests of, with

Plebeians, i. 265-70, 275-85, 286-

89, 91, 93, 95, 99, 114, 135, 137, 1 166, 394, 406, 418, 442; death of, in 08-0

Scapio, Gnaeus, b. 122-3, 135, 144. 145, 146

Scipio, Lucius ii 251, 255, 265 Scipio Nasica, in 22, 36, 88, 89, 99,

162, 430 Scipio, Publius Cornelius (Africanus). li 95 7, 105 et seq , 117, 123, 135, 144 6, 251 2, 264 5, 301, 306, 327,

337, 339 Scipio, Publius (younger), u. 128,

147 et seq , 158 et seq Scodra, 11 57 8, 220, 231 Scythians, Tauric, III 266, 267, 270-1 Seleucidae, the, if 202, 257, in 59,

1v 43, 158, fall of, iv 127 Seleucus II, il 66

Sellasia, battle of, 11 70, 92 Sempronian laws, 1v 83 Senate, Roman, i 76-81, 82, 83, 254-6, 260-2, 258, 313-8, 364-5, 384,

11, 298, 302, 304, 307, 319, 336, 1v 281, 284, 448, 449-50, iii 110, 211, 337 8, 340-1, 348, 362 Senones, 1 387, 388, 41 57 Sentinum, battle of, 1 377

Sequani, iv 212, 220, 221, 229 Sertorius, Q , 111 297, 299, 300, 304, 315, 323, 324, 332, 14 17 et seg, 26 et seq, 48, 507, death of, iv

33, 56 Servian constitution, 1 108, 185 188, 191, 192, 195, 244, 254, 277, il

200, 11 187 Servian will, 1 97, 108, 112, 235 # 1 Servilanus Q F Maximus, in 11 Servilius Caepio, Q, 10 171, 174, 175 and # 1, 194, 203, 204, 208 Servilius, G , ii 109, 110, 113, 114, 110. 122

Publius (Isauricus), iv Servilius.

41 2, 82, 151
Servins Tulius, i 245, reform of, i 91 et seq, wall ascribed to 1.55 Sextius, Gaius, bi 158, 160, bathsof, M 160

Six

Sicula the 1 31-2

by Greeks, i 130 is day, vince of, in 378, 379; slave wars in, iv 73, 76

Silo, Quintus, 1d. 221, 227, 230, 239, Sinnaca, 1V 315-6, 319

Smope, in 264, 267, 270, 279, iv 56, 514

Sittius, P of Nuceria, iv 417, 427, 513

Slavery under Rome, 1 24, 58, 59, 60, 149, 151, 193-4, 441, 442, 11 344 8, 349, 351, 357 8, 369 382, 391, 111 73 8, 130-5, 385, 387 8, iv 72-3 471, laws of, 1 156

Slaves, risings of, in 130-5, iv 74

et seq Social war, ili 222 et seq. 361, 332,

Spain, fi 83 et seq , 104, 143 et seq , 231, 242, 293, iii 204, 323 4, 397, under Rome, ii 153, 176, 192-9, war of Sertomus in, iv 18-21, 25. 34, 48, Caesar in, iv 198, con quest of, IV 365, under Caesar,

Sparta, 1 339, 372, 381, it 207, 227, 232-4, 242 3, 260, 262

Spartacus, iv 74 d seg State finance, farming of, L 265-6

Stesichorus, 1 460 Stuo, L Aelius, III. 443 4 Strabo, G Pompeius, iii. 229 et ser,

255, 281, 297, 300, 302 Suebi, iv 231

Spressiones, ly 204, 212, 232-3 Sulla, L. Cornellus ni 150-2, 177, 223, 228, 230, 236, 237 8 240, 243, 247, 248, 284, 308 et seq , 361, 381, character and career iv 35, 41, of in 358-68, march of, on Rome, in 249-50, 277, legulation by, in 252-5, in the East, lil. 271, 272, 281 95, 309, as dictator, mi 328-9, 357, 362, death of, bit 367,

IV 21 Sullan constitution, the, he 337 d seq, 362-3 364 5, opposition to, iv 83-3, fall of tv 80-02

Sulpicius Galba, P , li 218, 210, 221 3, 243 yar 209 | Sulpicius Galba, S. Id. 8 Yar 209 | Sulpicius & Milus ii 142, 153 Ya Milus ii 142, 153

iil. 223 237, 347. , iti. 244 et seg , 247 51 · int 230, 231

, 134, 136, 137 190, 191

Syracuse, L 131, 311, 311, 400 # 111 409, 414; 11 13, 26, 35 136-8, 175 Syria, ii. 66, 256; iii. 54-6, 57, 58, 59-60, 63, 258; iii. 58, 62, 318; conquest and settlement of, iv. 122-9 Tarentum, i. 131, 133, 137, 138, 130, 197, 321, 350, 359, 361, 368, 372-3, 361, 386, 387, 388, ct seq., 402, 403, 404, 407, 409; ii. 141, 159-61, Tarquinius, the Prond, i. 245 Tarquins, of Etruscan origin, i. 126; expulsion of, i. 245, 246, 257, 319; tomb of, i. 245 Taurie peninsula, iii. 266 Taxation, i. 300, 422; ii. 63-4, 315-6; iii. 108, 115, 337, 371 et seq.; iv. 90, 140-1, 466-7, 468-9 Taxes, leasing of, iv. 466.7 Terence, Publius, comedian, 434-5; iii. 419, 420, 421; and Plantus, 422-6 Teutones, war with, ii. 135; iii. 178-So Thapsus, battle of, iv. 418-9, 424 Thorius, Spurius, law of, iii. 126 Thrace, iv. 35; becomes Roman, 30 Thurii, i. 389 Tiber, river, i. 46-7, 108-9 Tigranes of Armenia, iii. 258, 268, 271, 272, 275; iv. 35, 42-4, 46, 48, 55, 102, 109, 110, 113-4, 130 Tigranocerta, iv. 44; siege of, iv. Timaens of Tauromenium, i. 461-2 Tolenus, the battle of, iii. 229-30, Tolosa, iii. 171, 172 Trades, i. 195-6, 198, 238, 441; ii. 356-7 and n.; iii. 384 Transalpine Province under Caesar, IV. 511-12 Transpadines, and political equality, iv. 149 Trasimene, lake, battle of, ii. 113 Trebia, the, battle on, ii. 107-9 and nTreveri, iv. 234, 244, 247-9, 264 Triarius, iv. 67, 82 Tribes, plebeian assembly of, i. 277-8 Tribunes, military, i. 287 and n. 1, Tribunes of the Plebs, i. 270-5, 280, 284-5, 311-13; iii. 342-3, 362; iv. 4, 84, 85, 90, 91, 150

Tribuneship, development of, by Gracehus, iii. 102, 112-3

Trifanum, battle of, i. 355

Tuscans, see Etruscans Tusculum, i. 345 Twelve Tables, i. 80 and n. 1, 217, 278, 300, 420, 428, 441, 452, 463, 465; iv. 518, 519; institution of, i. 281, 283 Tyrrhene sea, i. 130, 141 Tyrrhenians, meaning of term, i. 123 Umbrians, i. 9, 11, 13, 14, 151, 220, 370, 387; migrations of, i. 114-17 Umbro-Sabellian stock, fettlements of, i. 31, 33 Umbro-Sammte, dialects, i. 9, 11, Utica, ii. 10, 21, 60, 169, 170; iii. 24, 37, 38; iv. 368.9, 370, 410, 412, 420, 513 Vadimo, lake, buttle of, i. 387 Vadimonian lake, battle of, i. 369 Valentia, 1v. 27, 28 Valerian law, i. 248; iii, 328, 357 Valerio-Horatian laws, i. 283, 305 Valerius Corvus, M., i. 311 Valerius Flaccus, L., ii. 246 Valerius Flaccur, L., the younger, in. 308 and n., 309 Valerius Flaccus, L., interrex, iii. 328 Valerius, Manius, i. 269-70 Valerius Maximus, M., it. 33 Varius, Q., iii. 233 Varro, Marcus, iv. 359, 373 Varro, M. Terentius, ii. 117, 119, 120, 121, 122, 126, 128; iv. 359, 373, 455, 518, 529, 532, 558-65, 579-Vatinian law, iv. 191, 275 Vatinius, P., iv. 191, 297, 298, Veii, war with, i. 293, 303, 323, 328-9 Veneti, ii. 70, 182; iii. 164; iv. 235-7, 244, 366 Vercellae, battle of, iii. 181 and n. 1-82 Vercingetorix, iv. 351-62, 313, 321 Verres, G., iv. 85 Vesontio, iv. 229 Vestals, i. 43, 169, 251 Vesuvius, Greek settlements near. i. 137-8 Viriathus, career of, iii. 9-12 Volseians, i. 9, 13, 107, 142, 276, 282, 342, 343, 355, 356, 357-8 Volso, Gnaeus Manlius, ii. 255, 256, Volso, L. M. ii. 39

History of Rome

600

Weapons, Gracco-Italian, 1 22 Weights and measures, Italian, 1 199, 202 3, 205 8, iv 522 Woman, position of, i 57 and # I, 60, 149, 191; is 384, 1V 488

Writing, art of, in Italy, i. 217 9

Xanthippus of Sparta, n 41, 42

٠,

Xucar, the battle on, iv 27, 29

Zacynthus, island of, 11 260 261 Zama, battle of, 11 173 4, 207, 265, town, in 146

city of, 17 237

Ziela, battles of, iv 67, 68, 407 8,

winter, unexpected alike by friend and foe, on this side of the Alps. He quickly made the necessary preparations to cover the old province, and not only so, but sent also a corps over the snow-covered Cevennes into the Arvemian territory; but he could not remain here, where the accession of the Haedin to the Gallic alliance might any moment cut him off from his army encamped about Sens and Langres. With all secrety he went to Vienna, and thence, attended by only a few horsemen, through the territory of the Haedin to his troops. The hopes, which had induced the conspirators to declare themselves, vanished, peace continued in Italy, and Caesar was once more at the head of his army.

But what were they to do? It was folly under such circum stances to let the matter come to the decision of arms, for these had already decided irrevocably. They might as well attempt to shake the Alps by throwing stones at them as to shake the legions by means of the Celtic bands, whether these might be congregated in huge masses or sacrificed in detail canton after canton Vercingetorix despaired of defeating the Romans He adopted a system of warfare similar to that hy which Cassivellaunus had saved the insular Celts The Roman infantry was not to be vanquished, but Caesar's cavalry consisted almost exclusively of the contingent of the Celtic nobility, and was practically dissolved by the general revolt. It was possible for the insurrection, which was in fact essentially composed of the Celtic nobility, to develop such a superiority in this arm, that it could lay waste the land far and wide, burn down towns and villages, destroy the magazines, and endanger the supplies and the communications of the enemy, without his being able seriously to hinder it Vercingetorix accordingly directed all his efforts to the increase of his cavalre, and of the infantry-archers who were according to the mode of fighting of that time regularly associated with it. The immense and self-obstructing masses of the militia of the line he did not indeed send home, but he did not allow them to face the enemy, and attempted to impart to them gradually some capacity of intreach ing, marching, and manieuvring, and some perception that the soldier is not destined merely for single combat. Learning from the enemy, he adopted in particular the Roman system of encomponent on which depended the whole secret of the tactical superiority of the Romans for in consequence of it every Roman corps combined all the advantages of the garrison of a fortress with all the advantages of an offensive army.\(^1\) It is true that n system completely adapted to Britain which had few towns and to its rude, resolute, and on the whole united inhabitants was not alcolutely transferable to the rich regions on the Loire and their indolent inhabitants on the eve of utter political discolution. Vereingetoric at least accomplished this much, that they did not attempt as hitherto to hold every town with the result of holding none; they agreed to destroy the places not capable of defence before attack reached them, but to defend with all their might the strong fortregger. At the same time the Arvernian king did what he could to bind to the cause of their country the cowardly and backward by stem reverity, the hesitating by entreatier and representations, the envelous by gold, the decided opponents by force, and to compel or allure the rabble high or low to some manifestation of patriotism.

Even before the winter was at an end, he threw himself on the Boil settled by Carrar in the territory of the Harden, with the view of annihilating there, almost the sole trustworthy allies of Rome, before Caesar came up. The news of this attack induced Caesar, leaving behind the barrage and two legions in the winter quarters of Agedineum (Sens), to march immediately and earlier than he would doubtled otherwise have done against the insurgents. He remedied the forely-felt want of cavalry and light infantry in some measure by gradually bringing up German mercenaries, who instead of using their own small and weak ponies were furnished with Italian 911 Spanish horrer partly bought, partly procured by requisition it can the officers. Caesar, after having caused Cenabum, the option of the Carnuter, which had given the rignal for the revolvinter, allared and laid in ashes, moved over the Loire into the fountry of the Inturpres, He thereby induced Vercingetorix to alanger of the since of the town of the Boil, and to resort likewise to the Alituries. Here the new mode of warfare was first to be to feel. By strict of Vercingetorix more than twenty township of the listurbres perished in the flames on one day; the general decreed a similar self-devastation as to the neighbouring or don't, to far an they could be reached by the Roman foraging parties.

According to his intention, Avange a silverper, the rich

This, it is true, was only possible to a simed at cutting and stabbing. In Napoleon has excellently explained, at a more to entering on a principle arteite farte if mattate, be eters that the one lear pliestie, or trent a stress on the stress and because with our offensive weapons of position is more advantageous than A F Par to A Te ! It I cours & t me the reverse was the case.

rose with the view of attacking in the rear the corps of Labienus, while it confronted at Lutetia the levy of the surrounding cantons of central Gaul. Everywhere else too men were taking to arms; the strength of patriotic enthusiasm carried along to arms; and the most decided and most favoured partisans of Roman province: they cherished the hope, perhaps not without ground, of inducing the Allobroges themselves to take arms against the Romans. With the single exception of the Remi and of the districts-dependent immediately on the Remiof the Suessiones, Leuci, and Lingones, whose peculiar isolation was not affected even amidst this general enthusiasm, the whole Celtic nation from the Pyrences to the Rhine was now in reality, for the first and for the last time, in arms for its freedom and nationality:

German communities, wh the foremost rank, kept a

would seem the Menapiralso, were prevented by their feuds with the Germans from taking an active part in the national war.

It was a grave and momentous crisis, when after the retreat from Gergovia and the loss of Noviodunum a council of war was held in Caesar's head-quarters regarding the measures now to be adopted. Various voices expressed themselves in favour of a retreat over the Cevennes into the old Roman province, which now lay open on all sides to the insurrection and certainly was in urgent need of the legions that had been sent from Rome primarily for its protection. But Caesar rejected this timid strategy suggested not by the position of affairs, but by government instructions and fear of responsibility. He contented himself with calling the general levy of the Romans settled in the province to arms, and having the frontiers guarded by that levy to the best of its ability. On the other hand he himself set out in the opposite direction and advanced by forced marches to Agedincum, to which he ordered Labienus to retreat in all haste. The Celts naturally of the two Roman armies Marne and marching down reached Agedincum, where he had left his reserve and his buggage; but he preferred not to allow the Celts again to witness the retreat of Roman troops. He therefore instead of cross of the Marne crossed the Seine under the eyes of the deluded enemy, and on its left bank fought a battle with the hostile forces, in which he conquered, and among many others the Celtic general himself, the old Camulogenus, was left on the field. Nor were the insurgents more successful in detaining Caesar on the Loire; Caesar gave them no time to assemble larger masses there, and without difficulty dispersed the militia of the

Haedui, which alone he found at that point.

Thus the junction of the two divisions of the army was happily accomplished. The insurgents meanwhile had consulted as to the farther conduct of the war at Bibracte (Autun) the capital of the Haedui; the soul of these consultations was again Vercingetorix, to whom the nation was enthusiastically attached after the victory of Gergovia. Particular interests were not, it is true, even now silent; the Haedui still in this death-struggle of the nation asserted their claims to the hegemony, and made a proposal in the national assembly to substitute a leader of their own for Vercingetorix. But the national representatives had not merely declined this and confirmed Vercingetorix in the supreme command, but had also adopted his plan of war without alteration. It was substantially the same as that on which he had operated at Avaricum and at Gergovia. As the base of the new position there was selected the strong city of the Mandubii, Alesia (Alise Sainte Reine near Semur in the department Côte d'Or), and another entrenched camp was constructed under its walls. Immense stores were here accumulated, and the army was ordered thither from Gergovia, having its cavalry raised by resolution of the national assembly to 15,000 horse. Caesar with the whole strength of his army after it was reunited at Agedincum took the direction of Besançon, with the view of now approaching the alarmed province and protecting it from an invasion, for in fact bands of insurgents had already shown themselves in the territory of the Helvii on the south slope of the Cevennes. Alesia lay almost on his way; the cavalry of the Celts, the only arm withwhich Vercingetorix chose to operate. attacked him on the route, but to the surprise of all was worsted by the new German squadrons of Caesar and the Roman infantry drawn up in support of them.

Vercingetorix hastened the more to shut himself up in Alesia; and if Caesar was not disposed altogether to renounce the offensive, no course was left to him but for the third time in this campagn to proceed by way of attack with a far weaker force against an army encamped under a well-garrisoned and wellprovisioned fortress and supplied with immensemasses of cavalry But, while the Celts bad bitherto been opposed by only a part of the Roman fegious, the whole forces of Caesar were united in the lines round Alesia, and Vercingetorix did not succeed. as be had succeeded at Avaricum and Gergovia, in placing his miantry under the protection of the walls of the fortress and Leeping his external communications open for his own benefit by his cavalry, while he interrupted those of the enemy The Celtic cavalry, already discouraged by that defeat inflicted on them by their despised opponents, was beaten by Caesar's German horse in every encounter The line of circumvaliation of the besiegers extending about ten miles invested the whole town, including the camp attached to it. Vercingetorix had been prepared for a struggle under the walls, but not for being besieged in Alesia, in that point of view the accumulated stores, considerable as they were, were yet far from sufficient for his army-which was said to amount to 80,000 infantry and 15 000 cavalry-and for the numerous inhabitants of the town | Ver congetorix could not but perceive that his plan of warfare had on this occasion turned to his own destruction, and that he was lost unless the whole nation hastened up to the rescue of its blockaded general. The existing provisions were still, when the Roman circumvallation was closed, sufficient for a month and perhaps something more, at the last moment, when there was still free passage at feast for horsemen, Verengetonx disroissed his whole cavalry, and sent at the same time to the heads of the nation instructions to call forth all their forces and lead them to the relief of Alesia. He himself, resolved to bear in person the responsibility for the plan of war which he had projected and which had miscarried, remained in the fortress, to share in good or evil the fate of his followers But Caesar made up his mind at once to besiege and to be besieged. He prepared his line of circumvallation for defence also on its outer side, and furnished himself with provisions for a forger period. The days passed, they had no longer a boll of grain in the fortrees and they were obliged to drive out the unhappy inhabitarts of the town to pensh miserably between the entrenchments of ehind Caesar's lines the relieving army, said to amount to 250,000 infantry and 8000 cavalry. From the Channel to the Cevennes the insurgent cantons had strained every nerve to rescue the flower of their patriots and the general of their choice—the Bellovaci alone had answered that they were disposed to fight against the Romans, but not beyond their own bounds. The first assault, which the besieged of Alesia and the relieving troops without made on the Roman double line, was repulsed; but, when after a day's rest it was repeated, the Celts succeeded—at a spot where the line of circumvallation ran over the slope of a hill and could be assailed from the height above in filling up the trenches and hurling the defenders down from the rampart. Then Labienus, sent thither by Caesar, collected the nearest cohorts and threw himself with four legions on the foe. Under the eyes of the general, who himself appeared at the most dangerous moment, the assailants were driven back in a desperate hand-to-hand conflict, and the squadrons of cavalry that came with Caesar, taking the fugitives in rear.

&lt;sup>1</sup> The question so much discussed of late, whether Alesia is not rather to be identified with Alaise (25 kilometres to the south of Besancon, Dep. Doubs), has been rightly answered in the negative by all judicious inquirers.

completed the defeat.

It was more than a great victory; the fate of Alesia, and indeed of the Celtic nation, was thereby irrevocably decided. The Celtic army, utterly disheartened, dispersed at once from the battlefield and went home. Vercingetorix might perhaps have even now taken to flight, or at least have saved himself by the last means open to a free man; he did not do so, but declared in a council of war that, since he had not succeeded in breaking off the alien yoke, he was ready to give himself up as a victim and to avert as far as possible destruction from the nation by bringing it on his own head. This was done. The Celtic officers delivered their general—the solemn choice of the whole nation-to the enemy of their country for such punishment as might be thought fit. Mounted on his steed and in full armour the king of the Arvernians appeared before the Roman proconsul and rode round his tribunal; then he surrendered his horse and arms, and sat down in silence on the steps at Caesar's feet  $\binom{7.0}{5.2}$ . Five years afterwards he was led in triumph through the streets of the Italian capital, and, while his conqueror was offering solemn thanks to the gods on the summit of the Capitol, Vercingetorix was beheaded at its foot as guilty of high treason against the Roman nation. As after a day of gloom the sun breaks through the clouds at its setting, so destiny bestows on nations in their decline a last great man. Thus Hannibal stands at the close of the Phoenician history, and Vercingetorix at the close of the Celtic. They were not